FROM THE EDITOR

It is easy to overestimate the importance of managers and coaches in football. They get too much praise when they are successful and they are the first to be blamed when things go wrong. Players, meanwhile, are the individuals that really matter.

However, there is no denying the impact that a new coach can have on a struggling side, nor the effect of a strong personality on a group of players.

This month we turn the spotlight on some of the coaches who have made a difference to their respective teams over the past 12 months. The 25 selected (page 30) share some characteristics but there are crucial differences. Not all are young; Napoli's Maurizio Sarri is an overnight sensation at the age of 59. Others have struggled of late; Sunday Oliseh falling out of favour at Fortuna Sittard.

> There is no denying the impact that a new coach can have on a struggling side

But they all have the potential to move on to bigger and better things. It's unlikely that this is the last time they will feature in these pages.

Next month, our attention turns back to the players with the publication of the World Soccer 500 – our list of the most important players in the world game.

See you then.

Saudis move to La Liga in ground-breaking deal

Nine Saudi Arabian players have joined seven different Spanish clubs on loan deals in a bid to gain European club experience ahead of this summer's World Cup finals.

From Saudi Arabia's successful qualifying campaign, Yahya Al Shehri (27) has joined Leganes, Fahad Al Muwallad (23) is at Levante and Salem Al Dawsari (26) signed for Villarreal.

Jaber Issa joined Villarreal B, while Marwan Othman headed to Leganes' youth team. Segunda Division clubs also took Saudi players, with Nooh Al Mousa moving to Real Valladolid, Abdulmajeed Al Sulayhi joining Rayo Vallecano, Ali Al Namer signing for Numancia and Abdullah Al Hamdan now at Sporting Gijon.

The deals were the result of a partnership between La Liga, the General Sports Authority of Saudi Arabia and the Saudi Arabian Football Federation, with Saudi authorities paying all the related costs.

"These loan agreements, for an initial period of six months, allow these players to further develop their skills training and playing in Spain," said a statement from La Liga. "The incorporation of players from Saudi Arabia in the Spanish clubs follows a rigorous scouting programme

However, the Spanish players' union, the AFE, hit out at the deals, saying the moves sacrificed "the essence of this sport". A statement from the AFE read: "This new business model prioritises the economic aspect over the sporting one. This agreement impedes the development of young footballers and represents an obstacle to the opportunities for the youth academy, which isn't always accorded this type of opportunity."

In the finals for the first time since 2006, Saudi Arabia will play hosts Russia in the opening game of the 2018 tournament.

THE INSIDER

No escape from VAR

To VAR or not to VAR? That is the question facing the game's lawmakers when IFAB sits down in Zurich at the start of March to deliberate on two years' worth of worldwide trials.

FIFA president Gianni Infantino has been insisting that VAR will play a vital role at the World Cup finals in Russia this summer. Naturally, teething problems were inevitable and this is why trials have been approved around the world.

However, those trials have proved – in major domestic competitions and with some of the game's most experienced referees in Germany, Italy and lately England – that much more work is needed.

Ideally, issues regarding consistency in application, time lag and – most importantly – communication to players, officials and spectators should all be granted more time and consideration. Without this, the obvious risk is that repeated VAR controversies could overshadow the football at the World Cup – especially as many of the referees will not have experienced its use at high-pressure elite level.

But this then begs the question: should the World Cup be a laboratory for theoreticians?

This is important for FIFA in financial terms, never mind abstract concepts such as fair play and credibility.

The World Cup generates more than 90 per cent of all FIFA's income; hence keeping the money machine well oiled is crucial to not only FIFA but also to the majority of small and medium-size member associations which depend on its development largesse.

In January, IFAB's preparatory business meeting refrained from recommending the annual meeting approve VAR for use worldwide. Instead, it merely approved updated and refined instructions for both on-pitch and off-pitch referees. This was hardly a gesture of confidence despite a "thorough...positive and encouraging" application in more than 800 competitive matches around the world.

Belgian view... VAR has been trialled extensively throughout Europe

The stated objective of VAR is not to achieve 100 per cent accuracy but "to correct 'clear and obvious errors' and deal with 'serious missed incidents' in defined match-changing situations (goal, penalty/no penalty, direct red card and mistaken identity for disciplinary sanctions)".

> Many referees will not have experienced VAR at elite level...should the World Cup be a laboratory for theoreticians?

A consensus within the game appears content with this, even if a remarkable number of media analysts appear ignorant of the terms and conditions. So, IFAB faces a choice which is no choice.

IFAB comprises the four British home nations and FIFA. England, Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales have one vote each and FIFA has four. A positive decision in March would need a minimum of six votes, though it is customary to seek a consensus ahead of a vote. Infantino will not retreat on VAR. Hence responsibility for saying yes or no rests with the home nations. In individual terms this means their chief executives: Martin Glenn (England), Patrick Nelson (Northern Ireland), Jonathan Ford (Wales) and interim Scotland FA CEO Andrew McKinlay.

Logic suggests that, while IFAB harbours some doubts pending further development, the horse has bolted.

FIFA has already applied VAR at tournaments such as the Club World Cup and the Confederations Cup in Russia last summer.

The least IFAB may do is approve further experimentation which will clear FIFA to make its own decision about the World Cup, while hoping that those teething troubles can be sorted out before Russia and Saudi Arabia meet on June 14 in the Luzhniki Stadium in Moscow. WS

2026 vote is a two-horse race

Who will host the 2026 World Cup is a two-horse race between Morocco and United 2026 (comprising Canada, Mexico and the USA).

The system has been changed. No longer is it up to FIFA Council – this time the decision is set for June 13 among the full FIFA Congress after technical evaluations and a review by council the previous day. All 207 "other" member associations can vote in a ballot which, for the first time, will be open to view.

United 2026 has always been the clear favourite after Canada and Mexico agreed to drop notions of individual bids and join with the US, which would assume the role of "senior partner".

It is thought that FIFA president Gianni Infantino would prefer United 2026 for the following reasons:

• The need for a "safe hands" World Cup after the hostings in two successive contentious venues in Russia and Qatar.

• Greater confidence in the organisational, administrative, contractual and financial potential of a US-led hosting;

• The danger of upsetting US authorities yet again after their shock failure to win 2022, with a suspicion that this played a role in prompting a DoJ investigation into FIFA;

• The agreement already in place with Fox for broadcasting rights.

Of course, Infantino may also feel he "owes" United bid leader Sunil Gulati for playing a crucial role in seeing him elected in spring 2016.

However, a quick review of the numbers at play suggests Morocco may sit much closer within striking distance than popular opinion suggests:

• Africa (54 members): largely solid for "home" preference Morocco;

• Asia (46 members): mixed, although much may depend on the preference of Kuwait's Olympic powerbroker Sheikh Ahmad Al Fahad Al Sabah. A US-led bid should get support from Japan and South Korea but many Arab states will lean towards Morocco;

• CONCACAF (35 members): largely solid for United 2026 as fellow CONCACAF members, with similar timelines for television and hence advertising, sponsorship, etc – and despite US president Donald Trump's provocative fulminations;

• Oceania (11 members): already understood informally to have committed its votes to United 2026;

• South America (10 members): solid for United 2026 through excellent relations with Mexico; also a similar timeline for television and hence advertising, sponsorship, etc;

• UEFA (55 members): could be split one-third/two-thirds with the Mediterranean nations plus Russia and its "influenced neighbours" not willing to support a US-centric bid bearing in mind the doping scandal animosity.

The above would result in a 113-94 victory for United 2026 – which is much closer than many forecast.

Lethal...scoring against Libya in the semi-finals

The star of the recent African Nations Championship, Morocco's 24-year-old striker was the finals' top scorer, with his nine goals almost doubling the previous record for the tournament for African-based players.

As well as scoring in the Final, he also twice hit the woodwork with overhead kicks as the hosts beat Nigeria 4-0. Voted player of the competition, his goal haul included a hat-trick against Guinea and a double against Libya in the semi-finals.

Abel Majid Madrane, the president of El Kaabi's club Berkane, claimed in Moroccan newspaper Assabah that Atletico Madrid had made enquiries about taking the player to Spain.

El Kaabi's form at the tournament also increased speculation that he will be called into the Morocco squad ahead of this summer's World Cup.

UMUT BOZOK (Nimes)
The 21-year-old striker of French/Turkish descent has been on fire for Ligue 2 side Nimes, where he has been likened to Olivier Giroud, and was voted the second division player of the year for 2017.

IHLAS BEBOU (Hanover)

Jonathan WILSON

TECHNICALLY SPEAKING

Have top clubs given up on the art of defending?

Liverpool's Premier League fixture against Manchester City at Anfield in January presented an apparent paradox. The hosts went into the game with the best home defensive record in the league, conceding just four goals in 11 games, while City had the best away defensive record, with five goals in 11 games. Yet when the match finished 4-3, nobody was remotely surprised.

This is simply the nature of modern football. There are a handful of examples of top clubs who adopt a different approach – most notably Jose Mourinho at Manchester United and Diego Simeone at Atletico Madrid – but the majority of elite sides play a style that focuses on defending by position rather than by the more traditional arts of marking and winning headers and tackles. And that means when they come under pressure they are vulnerable.

That's why in the Premier League this season, meetings between the top six have tended to be raucously exciting. It's also why there has been an increase in victories by a large margin in the latter stages of European competition.

As football's rich have got richer, they have come to dominate their domestic leagues to a greater degree. Matches often become an exercise in attack against defence – which is increasingly the case even in the Premier League, which prides itself on the supposed fact that any side can beat any other side.

In the first three seasons that Opta collected data, between 2003-04 and 2005-06, there were only three Premier League games in which one team had 70 per cent or more of the ball. That figure rose gradually to 36 in 2016-17 – a tally that had been surpassed this season by January 1.

Finish...Mohamed Salah (right) scores Liverpool's fourth goal against City

That raises questions about the spectacle of big clubs becoming too dominant and rendering their domestic leagues less attractive. And it also affects how games are played when two members of the elite meet.

> In the Premier League this season, meetings between the top six have tended to be raucously exciting

Thrilling as last season's games between Paris Saint-Germain and Barcelona were, for instance, there is a long period of football history from, say, the early 1960s to the beginning of the decade, when such a tie would have been unthinkable. Gifted sides wouldn't have capitulated as first Barca and then PSG did, because they were used to defending and conditioned to battle.

That's not quite what was going on in that Liverpool-City game, though. Rather that was a consequence of two teams who both place an emphasis on playing high up the pitch and keeping the shape compact – which inevitably means leaving space behind the back four. If the back four is drawn deeper, then there is insufficient protection and they are vulnerable to opponents running at isolated defenders. That in turn means that when City or Liverpool concede goals it tends to look dreadful.

By signing Virgil Van Dijk and Aymeric Laporte, Liverpool and City have brought in players who are probably better at those traditional defensive arts than those who were already at the club. That, obviously, will help, but the issue is one of balance. For Pep Guardiola in particular, there is no point in having a powerhouse of a central defender who wins the vast majority of his aerial duels and is formidable on the ground if he cannot also pass.

That is one of the key lessons he learned from Johan Cruyff who, at Barcelona in the early 1990s, would at times play with Ronald Koeman as the central defender and Guardiola in front of him in a 3-4-3.

"They weren't fast and they weren't defenders," Cruyff said, but far more important was that their positioning was good and both were excellent distributors. Given that Barca spent most of the game in the opposition

Thrill...Barcelona beat Paris Saint-Germain in last year's Champions League after a 4-0 loss in the first leg half, then as long as his keeper was prepared to play out of his box the chances of Barca being undone by a long ball from deep hit over Koeman and Guardiola were minimal.

If you could get at the heart of the defence, Cruyff's Barcelona could be vulnerable. But he reasoned that occasionally conceding what others would consider a soft goal was a worthwhile trade-off for the advantages he felt were brought to general play by operating with a high line and with players who were very comfortable on the ball.

Essentially he defended by trying not to have to defend: a high-risk strategy that led to four league titles and Barcelona's first European Cup, but also to a 4-0 defeat to Milan in the 1994 Champions League Final.

That paradox makes assessment difficult. In six of Guardiola's eight completed seasons as a coach his side has not merely won the league but done so in breathtaking style. Yet he has so far won only two Champions Leagues.

Has he won those league titles in such style because of the high-risk strategy, or would he have been more effective in European competition with something more conservative?

A similar assessment lies at the core of all those who adopt the approach. While the advantages can be enormous, there is an enormous potential downside. WS

2 POLDI'S KEBAB SHOP

Former Cologne striker Lukas Podolski, who plays for Vissel Kobe in Japan these days, has returned to the German city to open a kebab shop.

And the excitement surrounding the grand opening of the Mangal Doner was such that more than a thousand fans queued around the block to be served by "Poldi", with some reportedly waiting five hours to place an order with their hero.

The 32-year-old, who was in the Germany squad that won the World Cup in 2014, is no stranger to the food business, having already opened an ice-cream parlour called Ice Cream United. He also has a clothing boutique, Street Kicker.

After signing autographs and serving customers, the German striker admitted: "Ideas just come – I don't even really have a business plan right now." And he countered arguments that he was setting a bad example as an athlete with his choice of nutrition, saying: "As an athlete, you'll burn a kebab in around 10 minutes."

3 VAR BLOCKED BY FAN FLAG

The trials of VAR have thrown up plenty of problems but none as strange as that experienced in the match between Aves and Boavista.

Aves midfielder Vitor Gomes was clearly offside when he scored in the Portuguese league game to give the home side a 3-0 lead, and furious protests from the visitors prompted the referee to call on the game's VAR official for a second opinion.

But the VAR official could not help – as a giant flag waived by a Boavista fan in the away end blocked the camera's view. And so the goal stood.

4 WINGER CHICKENS OUT

Mexico international Jurgen Damm became an internet sensation after footage appeared of him being led away from a fried-chicken restaurant in handcuffs after trying to hide from police in the shop's toilets.

The incident occurred when the 25-year-old winger, who plays for Tigres in his homeland, failed to stop after being requested to pull over while driving.

Fearing that he was about to be robbed, Damm later claimed: "I was confused when they asked me to stop my truck, and because I couldn't identify who it was I decided to hide somewhere close."

Jimmy ARMFIELD (1935-2018)

Mr Blackpool... Jimmy Armfield at Bloomfield Road

A unique figure in the history of English football, Armfield was a 1966 World Cup winner who became a successful manager and then went on to enjoy an entire new career as a journalist and media pundit.

He made his debut as a right-back for his home-town club Blackpool and went on to play 17 seasons for the team, making a total of 627 appearances and earning himself the nickname of "Mr Blackpool".

He won 43 caps, captaining England on 15 occasions and played at the 1962 World Cup. However, an injury at the end of the 1963-64 season allowed George Cohen to take over as the national side's first-choice right-back. Armfield was a member of the 1966 World Cup squad but did not play at the finals.

Following his retirement as a player in 1971, he managed Bolton Wanderers, overseeing a promotion to the Second Division in 1973, before succeeding Don Revie at Leeds United in 1974. Leeds reached the 1975 European Cup Final but lost 2-0 to Bayern Munich.

Armfield left Leeds in 1978 and opted to pursue a career in the media. He worked as a reporter for the Daily Express for more than a decade before switching to the BBC, where he became a widely respected match summariser.

In 2002, the then-Sunderland manager Howard Wilkinson, irritated by journalists questioning his tactics at a press conference, asked "How many England caps have you got?" The quick reply from Armfield was: "Forty three, actually, Howard."

A hugely respected figure within the English game, Armfield also acted as consultant to the FA, playing a key role in the appointments of Terry Venables in 1994 and Glenn Hoddle in 1996.

He led the seniors to the semi-finals of both the 1988 European Championship and the 1990 World Cup on home soil. THE VOICE OF FOOTBALL

Help...Craig Pawson consults VAR at Anfield

Anfield confusion demonstrates 'Spy in the sky' is a complex business

Perhaps inevitably, the introduction of VAR in the FA Cup has elicited instant controversy. Not least in the dramatic tie at Anfield, in which West Bromwich Albion got the better of Liverpool.

Even though his team scored three goals, West Brom manager Alan Pardew still had some interesting things to say about the new system.

"It's hard to know where to start," commented Pardew after the game. "I don't think this is what we want to see going forward, whether you are a Liverpool or West Brom fan.

"Firstly, there is no communication from the referee to us – like in the NFL when there is a call and they say they are going to look at that. But the bigger decision was the four minutes for the Salah decision [a missed penalty for Liverpool]. You are going from high-tempo work rate to nothing. We had a hamstring just after that.

"As a coach, we have to change. We are going to have to get our players to mentally warm-up in that situation and keep themselves ticking over.

"As a football person on the sidelines, I wasn't comfortable with the first half. It was a mysterious situation at times."

A complex one, certainly. On 19 minutes, it took two minutes' consultation between the referee, Craig Pawson, and his "spy in the sky", Andre Mariner, to disallow a Craig Dawson goal for West Brom for offside against Gareth Barry.

Soon afterwards, Pawson saw nothing wrong with a tug by the visitors' Jake Livermore on Liverpool's Mohamed Salah. It was the spy in the sky that gave the spot-kick after several minutes' stasis.

And what of Albion's third goal, duly awarded again after consultation? An own goal by Joel Matip, with Jay Rodriguez standing in an offside position.

The referee and his spy in the sky endorsed the goal.

No goal...VAR ruled that Gareth Barry (centre) was offside

Allardyce's time has been and gone

Everton's poor recent form has posed serious questions about the competence of Sam Allardyce, brought in to revitalise the team after the abrupt departure of Ronald Koeman.

After one or two useful victories, which at least seemed to keep the spectre of relegation at bay, he has left both Wayne Rooney and Gylfi Sigurdsson on the bench of late. They could hardly have done any worse in a team which has been overwhelmed at times.

It also surprised me that he loaned talented winger Ademola Lookman to RB Leipzig of the Bundesliga, where he made an immediate impact. He is a player I have much admired for his pace, control and efficacy since his early days at Charlton Athletic, where he developed.

I fear that Allardyce as manager has passed his meridian, but it would be very expensive for Everton to fire him now. And whom would they bring in?

Questions... Sam Allardyce

Gentleman Jimmy was a cut above the rest

Jimmy Armfield, whom I knew for so many years, was a footballer and a gentleman. Educationally a cut above most of his playing contemporaries, he was thoughtful, intelligent, humorous and a splendid right-back. He played in the Chilean World Cup, but in the victorious 1966 tournament his place at right-back went to George Cohen.

How well I remember sitting next to him at the Bank of England training ground around the time of the World Cup quarter-finals. What chance did England have, I asked him. "Slight," he said, depressingly. But luckily he was proved wrong, which doubtless delighted him.

He was a grammar-school boy, always fluent, composed and mature. Even in the midst of a tumultuous press room in Barcelona when Leeds United, whom he was managing capably at the time, contested a European Cup semi-final. A room from which Rober Vergna, the noted correspondent of France Football, was led away by the police in chains, having kicked out at a local radio commentator – who, luckily for him, refused to press charges.

What now for Wilshere with club and country?

Whither Wilshere? A question which in recent weeks seemed happily to have been put to rest after the talented midfielder had regained his first-team place with panache, after playing the bulk of the season with what amounted to Arsenal's reserve team.

But Arsenal, spending prolifically in the transfer window, have acquired the talented Henrikh Mkhitaryan from Manchester United. He hit the ground running in his display at home to an overwhelmed Everton, while that talented Welsh international Aaron Ramsey returned to the team to score a hat-trick.

Where now will be the place for Wilshere? I feel this is an important question, not only for the player himself but for the England team, who have no comparable playmaker available.

Gareth Southgate has suggested that there would be a place in his side for Wilshere and so there should be, but if he isn't playing for Arsenal – something that Southgate has hinted at before – it would be hard to pick him, even for an England team that needs him.

Talent...Jack Wilshere (right)

Conte caught in a Chelsea conundrum

Another manager whose stock has plummeted is Antonio Conte at Chelsea. Two shocking defeats – an almost incredible 3-0 crash at home to modest Bournemouth followed by a 4-1 eclipse at Watford – made it likely indeed that he won't see more than this season at Stamford Bridge.

It seems quite clear that Chelsea benefited greatly from not being involved last season in either of the European competitions. This season, Conte's demanding training sessions and the profusion of matches in the various tournaments seem to have taken their toll. Yet what of his seasons of success at Juventus, who were usually involved in European competition but still managed to lead Serie A for years?

Conte has made it plain enough with his protests that he has not been given enough playing resources. There is also the fact that his relations with Marina Granovskaia, who has become a power at the club, are fragile to a degree that he would be happy to move on.

With a year and a half still to be paid up on his contract of some £9million a year, he would hardly be on skid row.

Meanwhile, Conte continues to make defiant noises which have the smack of desperation about them, claiming: "Do you think a club can decide to sack a coach if there is not the support of the players? You think that players have the power? Yes? This is wrong. This is wrong if it happens. Yes?"

To the onlooker, it appears that Conte is caught between the upper and the lower millstone.

Meanwhile, Luis Enrique waits in the wings. And Chelsea miss Diego Costa.

Desert ambition

Morocco's hastily assembled bid to host the 2026 World Cup has been long in the making

The 2018 African Nations Championship (CHAN) came at an opportune moment for Morocco. Having replaced original hosts Kenya just three months before kick-off, the north African kingdom not only won the tournament but also found time to put together a bid for the 2026 World Cup.

Morocco beat Nigeria 4-0 in the Final at the Stade Mohamed V in Casablanca, which was rammed for the hosts' games, although some other attendances during the tournament were disappointing. While migrant workers from Cameroon and Libya, for example, boosted crowds at venues such as Tangier, spectators at a group decider between Zambia and Namibia were outnumbered by stewards.

With 2026 in mind, FIFA had secretly despatched staff to monitor proceedings and their reports should be favourable. Meanwhile, Morocco's triumph on the pitch suggests there is reason for optimism in Russia this summer.

With CHAN being a tournament solely for players who compete in domestic African leagues, Morocco's winning side was mostly a second XI. Many of national coach Herve Renard's first-choice XI are the children of expats living abroad, with the likes of captain Medhi Benatia, who plays in Serie A for Juventus, born in France, while Moubarak Boussoufa, who is now in Qatar, and Feyenoord's defensive midfielder Karim El Ahmadi both grew up in Holland.

The Federation Royal Marocaine de Football (FRMF) made a conscious effort to find these players – and they were a major factor in helping the country clinch a first World Cup qualification since 1998.

After a 20-year absence, missing out again would have dented Morocco's chances of hosting the 2026 World Cup. Instead, it is the USA – who are making a joint-bid for the tournament, alongside Canada and Mexico – who will be left at home kicking their heels this summer.

Russia will be the fifth World Cup finals' appearance for Morocco, who entered for the first time in 1962 and qualified at the third attempt for Mexico 1970, where they were not disgraced.

After missing out on the next three tournaments, they returned to Mexico in 1986 and reached the last 16 after winning their group thanks to a sensational 3-1 victory over Portugal. They also qualified in 1994 and 1998 but failed to win a game.

A year later, King Mohammed VI took the throne after the death of his father King Hassan II and ushered in nearly two decades of modernisation and investment.

Under King Hassan II, Morocco bid for the 1994, 1998 and 2006 World Cups, and then tried again for the 2010 finals which FIFA had decreed must go to an African nation. However, amid a swirl of corruption allegations still to surface in the long-running FIFAgate trials in New York, South Africa pipped Morocco by 14 votes to 10 – and the decision still frustrates many in Morocco.

"We know how we lost," says Hicham El Khilifi, the co-owner of Morocco's biggest sports radio station, Radio Mars. "It was not transparent."

The decision to make a fifth bid came late and was only confirmed last summer, long after the North America bid had begun making a stream of public statements. Only in January 2018 did the King appoint a bid team.

In Morocco, few refer directly to the King, preferring instead the epithet "the Kingdom". Most Moroccans agree that without the Kingdom, there would be no CHAN or World Cup bid.

"Any big decision must have the support of the Kingdom," says one local, who like anyone discussing the King prefers not to be named.

After a batch of reforms aimed at stemming endemic corruption, all of FIFA's members will vote on the 2026 World Cup and Morocco's bid is stronger than its predecessors.

There has been significant investment in stadia and infrastructure, with new toll roads and a 20billion dirham (£1.5bn) high-speed rail link between Casablanca and Tangier. But this spending has irked some, who feel the cash could have been better spent on schools and hospitals.

When the Morocco 2026 bid staged a hastily arranged press conference in the Casablanca Sofitel on January 23, this first attempt to communicate was dominated by the domestic media.

The cost of bidding for and staging the 2026 World Cup was raised in each of three rounds of questions, but no one on a panel led by FRMF president Fouzi Lekjaa would give any figures.

The rival North American bid has aired concerns over the commercial value of staging a tournament in Africa again, but Morocco is working on a financial document to show how the figures stack up. Yet bid chief executive Hicham El Amrani is giving little away.

"We are able to quantify these [figures] but we will do so in the bid book," says El Amrani. "It's part of providing a bid book on March 16 that is safe and sound.

"Those figures have been worked on. We will provide statutory evidence that a World Cup in Morocco will be highly profitable.

"When you talk about the sponsors, first of all there are the FIFA partners and sponsors who are there regardless of the host country. The rest are local partners or national supporters.

"That category is minimal when you look at the percentage taken by FIFA sponsors and partners. The majority of income comes from TV rights.

"Our geographic location and time zones match the same as nine African cities and 16 European nations, making a big impact in terms of profitability."

Insiders suggest that the aggregate cost of Morocco's five World Cup bids is around £70million, but no one will confirm this or the cost of hosting CHAN.

January's tournament was the first step towards staging the World Cup, with the second being the African Nations Cup (ANC). Morocco are favorites to replace Cameroon in 2019 if they do not make sufficient progress on preparations.

stage the 2015 ANC and upset many in Africa when they gave up the rights due to concerns over the Ebola epidemic. Taking on CHAN at short notice helped make amends.

While CHAN was staged in four cities – Agadir, Casablanca, Marrakesh and Tangier – no 2026 venues have yet been confirmed, although "six existing stadia" have been repeatedly referenced, and they are understood to be the CHAN venues plus Fez and Rabat.

In the past decade, around £175m has been spent renovating the Fez, Marrakech and Tangier stadia, which have capacities of 45,000, 45,250 and 45,000 respectively. Agadir can hold 45,480 fans, Casablanca has a 67,000 capacity and Rabat 45,200. All comfortably meet FIFA's stadia criteria, but more are needed.

At the bid launch, sports minister Rachid Talbi Alami said: "We have got a lot of great stadia but there is a lot of effort required on that. Finance is required."

El Amrani says a total of eight more stadia will be built if Morocco win the bid, but modular construction will be used at some venues to provide a capacity of more than 40,000 that can be cut to 20,000 after the World Cup.

Work started in 2015 on a 50,000 stadium in Tetouan, which will cost 700m dirham (£55m) and opens next year. But given Moghreb Tetouan's woeful performance in this season's domestic championship, that project could look like a white elephant.

Proposals are in the pipeline for a 40,000 ground in Kenitra, a 55,000 stadium in Oujda and a 40,000 arena in Al Hoceima, but not all Morocco's clubs can draw the crowds managed by Wydad and Raja for the Casablanca derby.

On the pitch, the performance of Moroccan sides in African club competitions has illustrated the strength of the local championship. Wydad won the CAF Champions League for a second time in 2017, while Raja have twice played in the Club World Cup and reached the 2013 Final.

According to the local branch of international players union FIFPro, which is run by former international Mustapha El Hadaoui, footballers in Morocco "enjoy reasonable conditions, and report less incidence of violence and harassment than in most other African countries".

FIFPro research from 2016 shows that 84 per cent of players experienced late payment, although Morocco's footballers are among the best paid in Africa.

In 2016, average wages were £800 a month but bonuses and subsequent wage inflation means that star players at big clubs can earn from £45,000 up to £180,000 a year.

World Cup qualification was also well rewarded. The players got a bonus of one million dirhams (£80,000) and Renard's salary was increased by a third to 800,000 dirhams (£65,000) a month according to local media reports.

Major clubs such as Raja and Wydad can earn as much as £70,000 in gate receipts from a big game, although smaller clubs make much less and have to rely on FRMF support.

The FRMF reportedly has revenues of 681m dirhams (£53m). Sponsors such as Maroc Telecom provide 567m dirhams (£44m) of this, with the balance derived from TV rights.

In 2015, the FRMF distributed 175m dirhams (£13m) in grants and bonuses to clubs in the top two divisions with the eventual national champions getting three million dirhams (which is about £230,000).

In return, the FRMF has sought greater control over youth development. It used to give clubs £90,000 a year towards youth development, but when it was discovered that this money tended to go on players' wages, a new deal was struck. Now the FRMF pays the wages of a technical director and conditioning coach – around £50,000 and £30,000 a year respectively – for each club, which gets the balance for unspecified use. It was a hard deal for clubs to turn down.

The FRMF has also introduced rules banning overseas goalkeepers and only allows clubs to use a maximum of four foreign players.

In 2015, experienced Dutch coach Mark Wotte was recruited to run the country's under-23s and his challenge, apart from helping develop the youth set-up, is to qualify Morocco for the 2020 Olympic football tournament.

This means finishing in the top three at the 2019 Africa Nations Cup Under-23s in Egypt. The finals only feature eight teams, so with the hosts qualifying automatically and qualification for the remaining seven slots decided by an unseeded knockout qualification system it is a tough task.

Success...Wydad celebrate winning the CAF Champions League last year

Sitting in the bar at the swish View Hotel in Rabat, Wotte – who was the Scottish Football Association's technical director for three years before coming to Morocco and has coaching experience in Egypt, Qatar and Romania – shrugs off the pressure

"The good thing about Morocco is that they are like Scotland in that they want to participate again," says Wotte. "That is driving all the projects here."

While Moghreb Tetouan and Rabat sides FAR and Fath Union Sport have good academies, the Academie Mohammed VI de Football (AMF) in Sale is widely viewed as the best.

"AMF has already produced 60 players that play first-team football," adds Wotte, citing 20-year-old defender Hamza Mendyl, who joined Ligue 1 side Lille two years ago and has a good chance of going to Russia.

Morocco's influence increasingly extends beyond its national border. Prior to launching the bid, the FRMF signed technical agreements with more than 40 other African associations from Gambia to Zambia, which can come and use Moroccan facilities.

The FRMF is also investing £3.5m in the football infrastructure in Malawi and last summer, Morocco staged a friendly tournament in Agadir featuring themselves, Kenya, Mauritania, Malawi, Niger and Togo.

Trouble...Wydad fans riot in December 2015

In Tanzania, Morocco is supporting the construction of a new football stadium costing up to £70m in Dodoma. Like the Malawi deal, this came at the behest of King Mohammed VI, who visited Dodoma in October 2016.

In late January, a FIFA letter distributed to member associations seemed to prohibit these agreements, which had all been signed before Morocco confirmed their bid. For many, this smacked of FIFA favouritism towards North America – and that is not the only issue for Morocco.

Although Morocco was not caught up in the Arab Spring, dissenters exist within the country and hooliganism can be a problem at local matches. In February 2009, 14 fans were jailed after a confrontation between Raja and Wydad supporters. In 2013, more than 200 arrests were made after trouble flared at the Casablanca derby.

Hosting the World Cup would also be a public-relations gift for activists from Western Sahara.

Formerly Spanish Sahara, the region, was annexed by Morocco in 1975 and the dispute, though little covered, remains unresolved. A 2026 World Cup in Morocco would attract huge global media attention, just as the 2022 tournament has highlighted the iniquitous treatment of migrant building workers in Qatar under the Kafala system.

FIFA's new World Cup bid criteria includes clauses on human rights but Lekjaa insists: "We have made big strides in the terms of human rights."

Sahrawi activists would not agree and they have already used football to protest. In 2012, a Western Sahara team took part in the VIVA World Cup for unrecognised states in Kurdistan. The Sahrawi association has been inactive since but joined the Confederation of International Football Associations in 2016, and a 2026 World Cup in Morocco would inevitably spur more activity.

A more obvious obstacle to winning the 2026 bid is FIFA's technical report stage, which could derail Morocco.

But even if the June 13 vote is lost, the country's increasingly international sporting ambitions seem highly unlikely to go away. WS

Maurizio SARRI

Old dog teaching Napoli new tricks

When Maurizio Sarri received a phone call from Napoli owner Aurelio De Laurentis in the summer of 2015, at first he thought he was the victim of a practical joke. By his own admission, it took Sarri a while before he realised that it really was the cinema tycoon on the other end of the line, asking him if he would accept the job of Napoli coach.

Sarri's moment of disbelief was understandable. Can it be, he must have asked himself, that after 20 years as a bank clerk, 25 years as a coach to 17 different clubs and just one season in Serie A, can it be that he was about to land the Napoli job? Was a career which began with amateur teams such as Stia, Faellese, Cavriglia and Antella about to move into the thin-oxygen zones of Serie A and the Champions League?

Disbelief...Sarri seemed a surprise choice to coach Napoli

The point about Sarri is that he belongs in that restricted circle of success stories – Arrigo Sacchi is another – who did not play professional football prior to coaching. When Sarri finally gave up his job as a bank employee in 1999, at the age of 40, he had already coached six amateur clubs.

"For me the bank was a piece of paper, a safe job," he told La Repubblica many years later. "I used to handle inter-bank currency exchange relations and I travelled all around Europe. But with the arrival of the Euro in 1999 there wasn't much money to be made working in currency exchange.

Crowded out... watching Napoli's 4-1 victory against Lazio (in stripes)

"As an amateur coach, on the way up, I reckoned I would survive all the same, but above all I was fed up hanging around at work just waiting impatiently to knock off at five in the evening and head off to team training."

It is an understatement to suggest that the 59-year-old is one of those Italian coaches who have done "la gavetta" (learned the ropes on the pitch). The poetic aspect of his 25-year-long rise to the top is that it ended up in his alma mater, namely Naples.

Although he has lived the majority of his adult life in Tuscany, and even started his football career there, Sarri was born in Naples. His father was a crane driver who moved down to the city to work in the huge Bagnoli steel plant, which is sited on the Bay of Naples, close to the city centre.

Growing up as a child in Figline outside Florence, Sarri used to be in a minority. While most of friends supported Fiorentina – with others following Internazionale and Milan, or even the dreaded Juventus – Sarri was a loyal Napoli fan. He recalls going to a Fiorentina game at home to Napoli and positioning himself among the away fans. So when the bank clerk ended up with the Napoli job, it really did seem too good to be true.

But De Laurentis had not just picked the name out of a hat. Like everyone else in Italian football, he had been much impressed by the quality of football played by the Sarri-coached Empoli side. With Empoli from 2012 to 2015, he had won promotion to Serie A with them in the 2014 season.

Promotion...he took Empoli into Serie A

While that in itself was good enough, it was the bright, positive football played by the newly promoted side that caught a lot of attention. Not only was the football attractive, it was also effective as Sarri's side managed to stay up at the end of that 2014-15 campaign.

Many wondered, however, if the old dog for the hard road of life in the lower divisions would survive at the very top, in charge of one of the current power houses of Serie A. It was only natural for some critics to wonder if, at the age of 56, the Napoli job had come too late.

Would his bright attacking football survive the test at the very top?

And there may still be those not entirely convinced by Sarri's Napoli.

Champions League failures against Manchester City this season, and against Real Madrid last term, would suggest that, at the highest level, his team is still in need of personality, conviction and stage presence. At home in Italy, however, Napoli lack very little and currently lead the dance.

It says all you need to know about the quality of Sarri's team that, right now, Napoli are the only conceivable obstacle standing between Juventus and a seventh consecutive title.

For the past two seasons, Napoli have looked the only side that could make a fight of it with Juve, especially in a dramatic 2015-2016 campaign when then-Napoli striker Gonzalo Higuain scored a record-breaking 36 Serie A goals. In the end, Juventus prevailed in the head to heads and the Napoli challenge wilted with the club eventually finishing second.

There have been signs, though, that this year it might just be different. An emphatic 4-1 home win over third-place Lazio, in a game which had begun with Napoli conceding a soft early goal, certainly looked significant. Napoli took to the field 24 hours after Juventus had thrown down the gauntlet, again overtaking them at the top of the table. The pressure was on and if ever there was moment for a wobble this was it.

However, that result – and others this season – would appear to give the definitive lie to any notion that Sarri cannot hack it at the top. What's more, he not only gets results but he gets them while remaining true to an attractive, positive 4-3-3 set-up that relies more on skill and technique than on muscle and brawn. Sarri likes to quote his granddad who would say: "We're playing football here, we're not unloading a lorry."

Not for nothing, the current Napoli side relies on a front line made up of three "little 'uns but good 'uns", with Dris Mertens flanked by Jose Callejon and Lorenzo Insigne. Faced with the lack of a central striker after the departure of Higuain and last season's early injury to Arkadi Milik, Sarri settled on the notion of Mertens as his centre-forward. Some 15 goals and counting later, the idea seems to have worked.

Mertens might not be good at unloading a lorry but he is distinctly handy in front of goal.

If Sarri's Napoli have a limitation then it is a very non-Italian one. Namely, he never plays the percentage game; rather his sides go out to play and take the game to the opposition. There is no sitting back and waiting in your own half for the opposition to come at you.

Sarri freely admits that one of his inspirations as a coach is Sacchi – the man who revolutionised Italian soccer with his Gullit-

Early days...in charge of Grosseto in 2010

Studious...he is a deep thinker who makes copious notes during games

Van Basten-Rijkaard inspired Milan team which turned the all-prevalent defensive Italian creed upside down with its attacking game.

Critics have suggested that Napoli's style is both too predictable and too physically demanding. But when asked about this by Guerin Sportivo recently, Sarri said: "If I look at the mental and physical state of the team at the end of last season, I would say no.

"My football is both application and fun. And if you are having fun, it is less tiring. You must never extinguish the child that is in every footballer."

If there is one accusation that critics are unlikely to ever level at Sarri it is that of being too politically correct.

Probably the first time that many outside of Italy noticed him came in January two years ago when he was involved in an unpleasant touchline row during an Italian Cup game with then-Inter coach, Roberto Mancini, calling his opposite number a "queer", for which he later issued a formal apology.

The thing is that Sarri sometimes seems like a coach from a different era. He likes to wear the old fashioned tracksuit, rather than the club blazer, shirt and tie when he sits on the bench. It is more comfortable, he says, and anyway he is not a fashion model.

He is an inveterate, heavy smoker who would probably smoke his way through a game if it were allowed, and he is not a frequent user of social news media.

Sarri expects his players to work hard and to train hard, and he is the first to admit that not every player finds this easy. He summed up his coaching philosophy neatly last year when telling La Repubblica: "I don't consider myself the depositary of truth but here you do what I say."

However, brand Sarri a dinosaur at your peril. He is always scribbling notes to himself on the touchline during games. He says he writes for two reasons. Firstly, he wants to focus on those "four things" that he wants to say at half-time. Secondly, he likes to take note of the time that certain incidents, movements, mistakes took place. That way, it is much quicker when it comes to editing his review of the game for post-mortem study purposes.

Sarri is also a coach who has not hesitated to use a drone during training, while he reckons that during his average working day he could spend up to 13 hours on tactics, between coaching sessions, video sessions and reading.

So then, where next for Sarri? Much will obviously depend on this season's results. Were he to lead Napoli to a third title triumph following the two won during the Maradona years – in 1987 and 1990 – he might well decide that the job was done and it was time to leave. Intriguingly, he has said that "after Napoli", he could see himself working outside of Italy, in Spain or indeed in the Premier League.

Could it be that, before long, Italy will be exporting yet another talented coach to follow on in the footsteps of Lippi, Ancelotti, Mancini, Ranieri, Conte et al?

Pushing Porto to new heights

All good teams reflect the personality of their coach and this very much applies to Conceicao's Porto, who are infused from top to bottom with the intensity, bravery, passion and single-mindedness of the man in charge.

A right-winger in his playing days – winning 56 caps for Portugal and notably starring for Porto, as well as Italian clubs Lazio, Parma and Internazionale – the 43-year-old does not only produce results but he delivers them post-haste, absolutely in his element when asked to swiftly turn a gaggle of underachievers into a real collective force.

Both this season and last, his Midas touch has been there for all to see: first at Nantes, who he steered from second-bottom in Ligue 1 to seventh in just a few months, then inspiring a remarkable revival at Porto, who after going four years without a trophy are once more flying high, putting together a long unbeaten run in the Portuguese top flight and qualifying for the last 16 of the Champions League.

Even if his preference for a 4-4-2 does not make him a reinventor of the tactical wheel, his teams certainly look the part with their ferocious high press and non-stop attacking intent. He insists on as much penetration as possible in wide areas and loves nothing more than to flood the opposition box with runners.

Those who fail to meet his exacting matchday standards of energy, discipline and aggression won't be around for long, while on the training ground he is a hard taskmaster, often ordering two sessions per day and quick to show his displeasure if anyone's concentration wanders.

"He's a coach who puts a lot of emphasis on the tactical side of the game," says midfielder Guillaume Gillet, who played under him at Nantes. "He's very demanding, very fussy. You have to be switched on. If you're not, he'll let you know about it."

Apart from his attention to detail, Conceicao is also a wonderful motivator. Players simply soak up his enthusiasm and positivity, not to mention the "us against the world" rhetoric. Workplace unity is vital too, with the squad required to come in early every day and have breakfast together.

In many ways, he is cut from the same cloth as compatriot Jose Mourinho. Temperamentally the pair could be twins, alternatively voluble, fiery, theatrical, charming and charismatic. Like Mourinho he is a mind-game devotee, often using his press conferences to get under the skin of opponents such as Rui Vitoria, the coach of arch-rivals Benfica.

"He's an absolute leader of men," says French defender Vincent Sasso, who played for him at Portuguese side Braga. "I quickly realised that he would go to war if it meant we'd have the right results."

Asier GARITANO

Shaking things up in La Liga

Now in his fifth season at Leganes, a club from the southern outskirts of Madrid who are known as Los Pepineros ("the cucumber growers"), Garitano has worked a succession of miracles these past few years.

Promotion from the third tier to the second in his inaugural campaign at the helm; the club's first-ever promotion to the top flight two years later; elite survival last term – and then this season's remarkable 2-1 victory at the Bernabeu to knock Real Madrid out of the Spanish Cup.

Leganes' annual budget of €45million is the lowest in La Liga and the squad is essentially a superstar-free zone, but that has not prevented the 48-year-old from assembling a line-up which punches well above its weight.

> "Winning promotion to the second division was more important"
> Garitano, after Leganes knocked Real Madrid out of the Spanish Cup at the Bernabeu

Solid, well-organised and enterprising on the break, the team's key to success is undoubtedly the coach's ability as a defensive co-ordinator. As a result of endless hours of drills on the training ground, Leganes have become the masters of the triple-locked back door in which everyone moves in unison, stays compact and shepherds opposition attacks out to the flanks.

Calm, methodical and meticulous, Garitano has created one of the meanest rearguards in the Spanish league. But don't make the mistake of thinking that he has 11 automatons out on the pitch. He constantly changes the tactical set-up – this season alone he has used five variants – and always shows a great deal of flexibility in his out-of-possession strategy; sometimes instructing the side to sit deep, sometimes triggering the press around the half-way line.

Organised...he has turned Leganes into a solid defensive unit

Another of his strong suits is his level-headedness and his flair for keeping his squad focused on the job in hand. Whether vanquished or victorious, he keeps his emotions in check, and even after beating Real Madrid he was breathtakingly matter-of-fact about it all. "No, I don't think this was our best-ever exploit," he told the media. "Winning promotion to the second division was more important."

The ultimate compliment one can pay Garitano is that, week in and week out, Leganes never play with fear or take to the field with an inferiority complex. Faced with Cristiano, Messi or Griezmann, he makes sure his charges play the shirt not the man, stating: "What I want is to always be competitive. The phrase 'out of your league' is one I've never liked."

A Real Sociedad fan as a boy, he was a skilful striker with Athletic Bilbao's juniors and reserves but never made the first team. After playing for a string of Spanish second and third division clubs, he finished his career at Alicante before becoming a coach.

His first job was an unusual one – employed by the country's national federation to supervise a group of unemployed professional footballers.

Hoffenheim's boy wonder with talent beyond his years

As the youngest coach in the Bundesliga, Nagelsmann's success with Hoffenheim has paved the way for a new batch of novice bosses in the German top flight. Taking their lead from the success last term of the 30-year-old, more and more Bundesliga clubs are plumping for a new wave of technical area talent.

Sandro Schwarz, formerly responsible for Mainz's under-23s, was put in charge of the first team last summer. Having traded their usual top-four berth for a brush with relegation, Bayer Leverkusen handed their reclamation project to elite rookie Heiko Herrlich. Schalke, meanwhile, appointed 31-year-old Domenico Tedesco, whose only leadership experience was 11 games in charge at second-tier Erzgebirge Aue.

It is not hard to see why other clubs are taking a leaf out of Hoffenheim's book. Since taking over at the south-westerner club two years ago, the coach has not only transformed a floundering, dispirited group into a top-four side, he has done it in an unfussy, perceptive way.

Renowned for his innovation on the training ground, his tactical flair and considerable powers of motivation, it is little wonder Hoffenheim founding father Dietmar Hopp puts him "on a par with a Mourinho, Klopp or Guardiola".

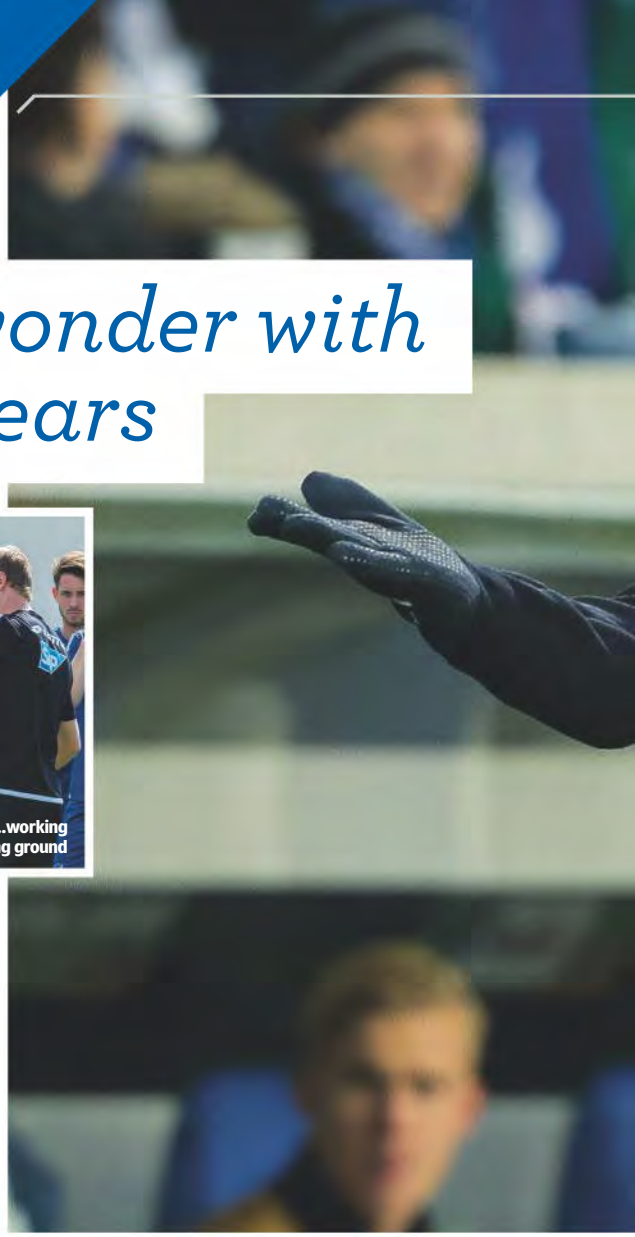
Understandably, though, many were sceptical when Nagelsmann was appointed coach in the autumn of 2015, promoted from his position in charge of the club's under-19 side. He had been due to take over at the start of the following season, but when Huub Stevens resigned on health grounds in February 2016, Nagelsmann became the youngest coach to be put in charge of a Bundesliga first team. At the age of 28, a number of Hoffenheim's senior players were older than their coach.

Innovative...working on the training ground

With Hoffenheim in 17th place in the table and facing relegation, it was assumed his brief was to oversee a soft landing into Bundesliga 2 and rebuild the team in the second tier. But Nagelsmann, whose playing ambitions were ended by a knee injury aged 20, had other ideas.

The rookie coach quickly rebuilt the players' shattered confidence, breathing new life into a team previously struck dumb by fear and seemingly resigned to their fate. He remained calm in the eye of the relegation storm, astutely shielding his squad from pressure.

"What he's done is unblock us mentally," said centre-back Niklas Sule. "He knows exactly when to raise his voice and assert his authority and when to be protective of us."



Motivator...driving his Hoffenheim team on

After avoiding the drop, Hoffenheim stormed the 2016-17 season, finishing in the Champions League places and earning Nagelsmann the accolade of Bundesliga coach of the season.

He has fostered squad unity by sharing a training-ground office with his assistants, while also placing great emphasis on the equal treatment of reserve players. There have, however, been problems this season, with his team limp and lifeless in the Europa League and showing signs of fragility on the Bundesliga front too. They have been inconsistent, defensively sloppy and not nearly as clinical in front of goal as they were last season.

To a large extent, Nagelsmann has been toiling against factors beyond his control. A squad too shallow to compete on multiple fronts and players totally out of form, notably forward Andrej Kramaric and centre-back Havard Nordtveit, while striker Sandro Wagner departed for Bayern Munich during the winter break.

It's also as clear as day that the club

Impressive... Hoffenheim beat high-flying RB Leipzig 4-0

are still paying the price for Bayern's summer-time swoop for stopper Sule and midfield linker Sebastian Rudy. The German internationals were the heart and soul of the Hoffenheim operation and simply have not been replaced.

"I like to be honest in what I have to say and have to admit we're in a results crisis," declared Nagelsmann after a 3-0 thumping at Hamburg. "We cannot live off what's happened in the past. We have to get back to reality."

Seven days later, he had the reaction he was looking for as high-flying RB Leipzig were beaten 4-0.

He was linked with the Borussia Dortmund hot-seat when Peter Bosz departed in the autumn. Bayern also remain long-term suitors, with Nagelsmann noted for his knack of taking points off the perennial champions.

Last season, he and his charges took four points from the Bavarians, and in September he once again demonstrated his uncanny ability to outcoach his opposite number when Hoffenheim recorded a fine 2-0 home win over the defending champions.

While Bayern had the lion's share of possession with 72 per cent, they had neither the space or the time to do much with it – and that's exactly what Nagelsmann intended, harassing and stifling Carlo Ancelotti's side, then landing the sucker punch.

Not all of Hoffenheim's heroes against Bayern were listed on the teamsheet. A young ball boy also played his part, his speedy recycling work enabling a quickly taken throw-in which led to the home side's opening goal on 27 minutes. Bayern's protests were in vain. They had been caught sleeping on the job.

"We make a point of educating our ball boys to get the ball back into play quickly," smiled Nagelsmann.

Even with a 5-2 loss to Bayern in January – Bayern bouncing back to win comfortably, including a goal from Wagner against his former side – the scoreline did not tell the whole story. Hoffenheim had stormed into a two-goal lead in the first 12 minutes and Bayern coach Jupp Heynckes was full of praise for Nagelsmann after the match.

Last year Nagelsmann shrugged off links with Bayern, saying: "It's a relatively normal state of affairs. Football is like that. If you're successful, you're built up. The period when judgements are formed is a short one and of course, it can go either way.

"With me it's gone to the positive extreme. If we were to lose a few games, it would go in the other direction.

"It's no secret that I'm very ambitious. I'd like to think that can be seen in training and on matchdays. I want to deliver as much as I can at Hoffenheim. Whether it's enough to win a title remains to be seen."

Bayern are reported to be trying to persuade Heynckes to stay beyond this summer and the club hierarchy is said to be having doubts over Nagelsmann's experience, especially given Hoffenheim's struggles in Europe this season when they lost a Champions League qualifier to Liverpool and then failed to make it out of the Europa League group stage.

But time is on Nagelsmann's side and he will not remain at Hoffenheim forever.

Helping Augsburg to punch above their weight

A former secondary-school teacher – specialising in sport, business studies and law – the 38-year-old Bavarian has proved a quick learner as a coach. In a poll of German top-flight players, conducted by Kicker magazine at New Year, he was listed as the third-best boss in the country, outstripped only by Schalke's impressive young leader Domenico Tedesco and Bayern Munich golden oldie Jupp Heynckes.

Previously Augsburg's head of youth development, Baum has been busy this season making his critics eat their words.

Back in August, more or less every mainstream pundit was picking the Augsburger for the drop, citing the clutch of key players who had left in the summer and a morale-sapping German Cup loss to third-tier Magdeburg on the eve of the new campaign.

Defying the drop ...Augsburg's Baum

However, Baum's side turned out to be anything but no-hopers, losing just five of their 17 games in the Autumn Championship and going into the winter break in ninth place.

Although he normally sets up in a 4-2-3-1 formation, like all astute coaches these days he does like to ring the changes, such as switching to a five or three-man back line. But whatever the shape, the key components remain the same: the high-pressing; hard running and athleticism, with lightning-quick transitions after winning the ball back.

Never without his laptop and setting great store by video analysis, Baum was once employed by Sky Deutschland, either providing research material or appearing in the studio.

"In the way he works he's meticulous, direct and precise," explains Erik Meijer, the former Bayer Leverkusen striker who is now a Sky presenter. "From minute one of a game he has the systems being used all worked out and knows how they can be cracked. For every problem on the pitch he looks for the solution.

> Sky presenter and former Leverkusen striker Erik Meijer

"He's not one to push himself forward. He sees himself working for the common good. I rate him as a coach and a man."

As a young keeper, Baum was good enough to play for the juniors at 1860 Munich. His first taste of senior coaching was at third-tier Unterhaching, where he was an assistant to coach Heiko Herrlich, who now is in charge at Leverkusen. "He had a feeling and an eye for what the opposition was going to do," says Herrlich.

Defying the odds with Shakhtar

Having spoken of his desire to work in England, the 44-year-old Mozambique-born boss was strongly linked with Everton not so long ago, only for his employers at Shakhtar to emphatically refuse to come to the negotiating table.

In control since the summer of 2016, he has done a fine job with Shakhtar, setting the wheels in motion for a Ukraine league and cup double last term and their qualification for the last 16 of this term's Champions League – a campaign in which they were especially impressive in their two games with Pep Guardiola's Manchester City, when they were unlucky to lose 2-0 at the Etihad and won the return fixture 2-1. Resolute in defence and tactically disciplined, they even managed to outpass City.

> "They are one of the best teams I've ever come up against...they are extremely well-organised defensively and their build-up play is amazing"
> Pep Guardiola on Fonseca's Shakhtar

It's a rare moment indeed when Guardiola is outwitted, but for much of those 180-plus minutes it was Fonseca and Shakhtar calling the shots, crowding out City in midfield and masterfully retaining possession.

The goal by Shakhtar left-back Ismaily in the victory over City in Kharkiv was a perfect illustration of Fonseca's fluid-football philosophy. A move consisting of 24 consecutive touches in 76 seconds, it was a sequence of short balls, passing triangles and heads-up awareness.

As a self-confessed Guardiola fan, Fonseca would have been delighted to hear City's manager shower his team with praise, stating: "[Shakhtar] are one of the best teams I've ever come up against. They have a fantastic dynamic. They have great players, they are extremely well organised defensively and their build-up play is amazing. They are a machine."

Fonseca first began to show his tactical acumen in the 2012-13 season at unfashionable Portuguese outfit Pacos Ferreira, steering them to a third-place finish in the league and a Champions League play-off slot.

Suitably impressed, champions Porto brought him on board but he never really got to grips with the job and was fired in March 2013. Revitalised back at Pacos, he then went to Braga, where he enjoyed a success-packed 2015-16 campaign in which his side won the Portuguese Cup and reached the quarter-finals of the Europa League.

Once a solid, reliable centre-back with Leca, Belenenses, Maritimo and Estrela Amadora, his first leadership role was with the Estrela youth team.

Pioneering African in Europe

Technically, Mario Wilson was the first black African to coach a club in Europe, and his tenures in charge of both Portugal's national side and Benfica are almost as high as one can achieve.

However, Wilson, who died in 2016, aged 86, may have been born in colonial Mozambique but he spent all of his adult life in Portugal and was completely integrated into European football.

So too 48-year-old Lito Vidigal, who was most recently in charge of struggling CD Aves and has also coached Portuguese sides Portimonense, Uniao Leiria and Belenenses, as well as having spells in Cyprus and Israel. Angolan-born but brought up in Portugal – where he played all his club football – Vidigal elected to play for the country of his birth and would therefore later become the first African international to coach a top-flight side in Europe.

The latest groundbreaker for African coaches in Europe is Sunday Oliseh who, in his first major club job, was chasing promotion to the Eredivisie in Holland with Fortuna Sittard. That was until a fall-out with the club's board, which resulted in the Nigerian being suspended from his duties.

The 43-year-old joined Sittard a year ago when they were one place off the bottom of the second tier. And after losing just one of his first nine games in charge, he successfully led them to safety.

> "Some people – not all – believe that, as an African, with any success you achieve, or position you attain, you are not in your rightful place. You belong lower"

Oliseh proved something of a catalyst in his playing days too, as the first Nigerian to play in Serie A – where he played for Reggiana and Juventus – and also enjoying distinguished spells at Cologne, Ajax, and Borussia Dortmund, before finishing his career with Genk in Belgium, where he has lived ever since.

Thoughtful...Oliseh

After working as a youth coach for a decade, he graduated with a UEFA Pro Licence through the Football Association in England but found getting a job at a European club almost impossible.

"The blunt truth is you run into some people – and I repeat the word 'some' people, not all – who believe that, as an African, with any success you achieve, or position you attain, you are not in your rightful place. You belong lower," he says.

"They will never accept the fact that sometimes you have better knowledge than them in the job; you have better knowledge than them as regards how football should be played. Even if you played at the highest level, they believe it was because of talent but not because of the cerebral part. They feel that as an African you shouldn't be there.

"But I repeat again, it's some people, because if everyone thought like that then I wouldn't have this job. If they thought like that I wouldn't be part of the FIFA technical committee. They are some. They are few. But sometimes they are ones who make the decisions.

"It affects your progression. But as an African what do we do? Do we just buckle down and accept it? For me to succeed, I know I have to do three to four times the work a 'normal' person must do."

Oliseh went back to Nigeria as national coach in 2015, but resigned by e-mail after eight months, saying he was not enjoying the experience. He headed back to his base in Eupen – and then came the chance of a job just 40 minutes by car from his home.

Respect...he has made relegation battlers into promotion chasers

"A colleague and a friend of mine gave me a call because he knew I was trying to find clubs to coach," he explains. "He said to me, 'hey, it's risky, it's dangerous, it's a club near extinction, financially in trouble and not doing well in the sporting aspect either. But they might need a change'. I told him, 'OK I'm interested, let me see what I can do'.

"He said to me, 'let me make a call' but I said 'no, I will make the call'. He was surprised because normally it's agents or managers who make the calls. So I made the call and immediately they said they wanted to meet me.

Focused... Oliseh turned things around

"We also had players here who were just coming for their retirement, far too relaxed, so I promoted younger players and I made it very clear to those players with ideas of a pension that approach was not going to work with me. I played the youngsters and they just went at it and the results followed."

Now he is attracting considerable attention but admits: "I've worked hard, like mad. I'm conscious of the fact it's a make-or-break opportunity. I'm not only a coach here, I try to be a psychologist to the players, a brother figure, a father figure to the younger ones.

"I know success here will open, at least, the eye of Europe to what an African coach can do. That's why I feel blessed at the publicity I have been getting with people coming from around the world, coming to see what's happening and what is an African coach doing."

Unfortunately, Oliseh ran into problems with Sittard's eccentric Turkish owner, Isitan Gun, particularly over player recruitment. That prompted Oliseh's controversial suspension, which he refused to see as a sacking.

"Sometimes I come in the dressing room and there is suddenly a new player," says Oliseh. "There is a lot we can do, but at the same time we are highly limited.

"We are renting our training ground. With the players too, I have to work with very limited resources.

"We have to look at whether the club is willing to be promoted. Are they ready for it? That's another matter. I've been asked this question repeatedly, daily for the last months now. People are excited and surprised that we are where we are. But we have to wait and see."

High hopes...Sittard celebrate a goal in the Eerste Divisie

"I told them, 'I believe I can help you guys out of the position you are in'. At the time it was so bad the club had one point from 10 games. For the supporters, for the city, it was like it was doomsday.

"So when I got the job, from the first day on, I had to change the way players looked at things; bring some optimism, put some light into the place and make it clear hard work would be key. We won the first game, against the side who were below us – we were second to last. By beating them we immediately created a six-point gap. That's how it started and I just kept the team focused."

But it was not easy, says Oliseh, as again he found unnecessary hurdles placed in his path.

"I had many difficulties, some tough situations," he continues. "The existing coaching staff were so antagonistic but I just kept my cool. What helped a lot was my experience from the national team of Nigeria. I just handled it in a calm way.

Thierry LAUREY

Promotion specialist leading the Strasbourg revival

Some accuse him of being overly abrasive; others believe his straight-talking does more harm than good. But does it really matter when the coach in question has such an obvious talent for delivering teams that are worth far more than the sum of their parts?

A former midfielder with Marseille, Montpellier and Sochaux, he specialises in taking unfancied sides to new heights, leading Corsican side GFC Ajaccio from the third tier to Ligue 1 in just two years and winning the Ligue 2 title last season with newly-promoted Strasbourg – an amazing achievement for a club which went bankrupt in 2011 and very nearly disappeared altogether.

Back in the top flight for the first time in nine years, Strasbourg won just three of their opening 15 league games this season. But they are breathing much easier now, showing much more of a killer instinct and benefitting enormously from their coach's knack for the right tactical tweak at the right time.

Laurey has put together an energised band of brothers and this was very much in evidence when they beat Paris Saint-Germain 2-1 in December – the first time that the runaway league leaders had bitten the dust this term.

It was a result which shocked French football. Yet, true to form, Laurey refused to go overboard. "We played well," he acknowledged. "We had little bit of luck. We have to admit it. The result could have gone either way.

"To beat such a team the planets have to be aligned and you have to perform to your absolute maximum. My lads fought like lions. I'm proud to be coach of this side. If we don't become carried away, we can stay up."

On the training ground he is not necessarily the easiest to deal with. He is a perfectionist for whom every detail counts, someone who cannot or will not suffer fools gladly.

"During a session, he can have some really harsh words for a player," recalls former GFCA goalkeeper Clement Maury. "That does not stop him having a joke a few minutes later with the very same guy.

"He just wants to make his players and team better. He gets straight to the point. He does not go around the houses."

> "I'm proud to be coach of this side. If we don't become carried away, we can stay up"

Tactically he seems to have evolved of late. For the vast bulk of his coaching career he was known for his devotion to a 4-4-2 featuring a midfield diamond, but this term he has enjoyed success with a 4-3-3, 4-1-4-1 or 4-3-1-2. As a rule of thumb, he wants his team to grasp the initiative, to be incisive and direct in its attacking play.

For Laurey, it's all about results. As he said last year: "The objective in this game is not to keep possession and have the biggest number of completed passes."

Massimo ODDO

World Cup winner breathing new life into Udinese

The new boss of the Zebrette was a member of Italy's World Cup winning squad in 2006, enjoyed a playing career as a highly regarded right-back for Napoli, Lazio and Milan, and is now considered one of the brightest football thinkers in the country.

Oddo has only been in the Udinese hot seat for a few months – appointed in November after the under-performing Luigi Delneri was told to clear his desk – but what a difference he has made, winning seven of his first eight Serie A fixtures to lift the mood in the camp.

It was his formidable drive and spirit which effectively took him to the top as a player and, not surprisingly, his Udinese side also boasts similar qualities. He was never one to be intimidated by a challenge and nor are his new charges.

> "I don't have a magic wand. I and my assistants do our job, but it's the players who have to go out on the pitch and deliver"

"What we've tried to do here is to increase the amount of enthusiasm around the place," he explains. "That's a vital ingredient in any dressing room. That said, we mustn't get over-excited.

"There's a danger of becoming complacent and making mistakes. I don't have a magic wand. I and my assistants do our job, but it's the players who have to go out on the pitch and deliver."

Capped 34 times, he is proving to be a canny tactician. His first act at Udinese was to change Delneri's 4-4-2 into a deep-sitting 3-5-2 and the benefits have been manifold: an improved defensive unit, more control in midfield and a greater counter-attacking threat.

For Oddo it's been a case of horses for courses; of finding the right shape for a young group fizzing with energy, power and endurance. On that basis, the switch to 3-5-2 made itself, declaring: "I have my ideas but I'm no fundamentalist. At Pescara last season I used a 4-2-3-1. My ideal type of football is all about winning the ball back straight away.

"Playing well doesn't depend on the system. What counts is the capacity of the players to perform the tasks they are asked to do. As long as you have a collective which works, the individual quality will blossom."

Prior to coming to Udinese, he worked at the Pescara club in his home region of Abruzzo, first taking charge of the youth team then being handed the first-team reins in May 2015. A year later, he led them to Serie A with a play-off victory over Trapani. Sadly there would be no happy ending and he was sacked the following spring after a disastrous run of top-flight results: not one single victory in 24 games. A deeply painful experience, though one he clearly has learnt from.

One thing you can always be sure of with Oddo is an interesting take on all matters football. Such as when discussing Italy's non-qualification for Russia 2018.

"While missing out on the World Cup is an enormous disappointment, from a certain point of view, some good could come out of it," he told La Repubblica.

"Our World Cup win in 2006 was in effect our biggest defeat. We saw ourselves as number one and didn't feel the need to make any changes. Defeats encourage you to take a different path.

"I hope we can bounce back from this setback with new ideas."

Facetoface

BERNARDO SILVA

"To be trained by Guardiola and to play alongside so many great players...that was the reason I chose City"

The Portuguese midfielder talks about leaving Monaco for the Premier League and his country's chances at the World Cup this summer

Why did you go to Manchester City when you left Monaco in the summer?
I chose City because, first of all, after all the amazing achievements at Monaco, I thought it was the best moment to change and try something different. I had just won the French league. I had played for three years at Monaco and we reached the quarter-finals and, last season, the semi-finals of the Champions League. I chose City because it's a pleasure to be in one of the best leagues in the world, if not the best. Then it seemed to be a great opportunity to be trained by [Pep] Guardiola, and to play alongside so many great players and learn from them every day.

Was working with Guardiola a big incentive?
Definitely. Everyone knows that he is one of the best coaches in the world – the way he thinks football, the way he feels the game, the passion. I wanted to be able to learn from him every day and work with him.

How does he differ from your previous coach, Leonardo Jardim?
All coaches are different. Jardim is a great coach. He gave me the opportunity to play at a high level. I am thankful for that. He is a coach who has this great ability to work and develop young players and give them the opportunity to play at a good level. I am very grateful for all the work that he has done with me over the last three years. I wish him all the best. He is a great coach. He has been doing a great job with Monaco.

Has Jardim been the most important coach in your career so far?
Probably, yes. I was with him for three years, so I spent most of my professional career with him. My time in Monaco was a happy time. I learned a lot from him at Monaco. He is special to me.

What are the qualities and characteristics of your game that you feel you developed most at Monaco?
When you play at the level of the French league and the Champions League one important thing is the pressure: how to handle pressure and how to handle big games. Over time, I began handling it better. Nowadays, that is very important.

Last season Monaco won Ligue 1 for the first time in 17 years...
It was probably one of the best, if not the best, seasons in Monaco's history. We were, and still are, very proud to win the league against Paris Saint-Germain, which is such a strong team and has power in France – and in Europe today as well. It was wonderful to reach the semi-finals [of the Champions League] and eliminate Manchester City, Dortmund and Tottenham Hotspur. It was an amazing run and I will always remember that season as one of the best in my career.

Big deal...Silva joined City for a reported £43.5m

What was the secret of that Monaco side, which scored a record 107 league goals?
It was the mental aspect. When you start winning games you have to remain hungry and try to win even more games. That's what we did. At the start, no one believed that we could become the champions or reach the semi-finals [of the Champions League]. We had a lot of young players who wanted to win titles and do big things. We were able to achieve great things and that was the secret: to always be hungry to win titles and win even more.

How have you adapted to

MANCHESTER

life in England so far?
It's been great to be in Manchester. It's very different. The players and staff received me very well. I am adapting little by little. I am feeling more and more comfortable. I hope that I can help the team as much as possible to win as many titles as we can.

Next season David Silva will turn 33. You have the same profile, same style, same left foot and even the same height. Can you become his successor?
I do hope so. David [Silva] is a great player, one of the best midfielders in the world. If one day I could reach his level it would be great. He is a very important player for Manchester City. As I said, it's a pleasure to train with these kind of players and learn from them every day.

What have you learned from Guardiola so far?
All the small details – the way he understands football and the passion he puts into the game. Everything is so important. With Guardiola you learn every day – tactically, physically, mentally – and to know how to deal with all the situations in the game.

He demands attacking and defending in all the game phases...
In football today, the new generation and the new football that we play, everyone has to defend and attack. Everyone has to be prepared to recover the ball as fast as possible when you lose it. That is what we try to do and that is what Guardiola wants us to do – to keep the ball when we have possession and score. When we don't have it, to press high and recover it as fast as we can.

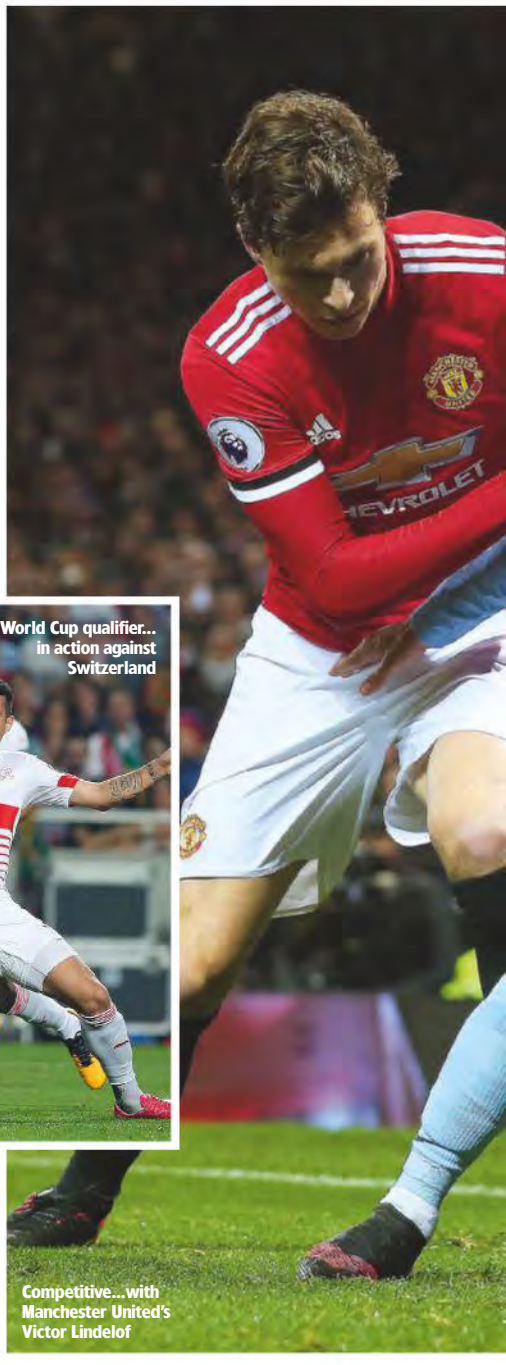
Is chess an adequate comparison for the game that he envisages?
He thinks about everything. He likes to have intelligent players, to go into all the small details and to plan everything, so, yes, a little bit. When you are a player and you know exactly what to do – when you have the ball, when you don't have the ball, when it's a corner, a free-kick, whatever the situation is – it helps the team to get results when you know how to react. It's one of his biggest strengths.

Are Manchester City favourites for the Premier League?
A little bit. We have eight points more than Manchester United and nine, 10, 11, 12 points more than the rest. Manchester City are slight favourites, but in the Premier League you never know. All the teams are so strong. You can always drop points, wherever you go, whoever you play. We will do our best to keep going this way and to keep winning our games.

Are your Manchester rivals the only team capable of catching you this season?
Manchester United are a strong team. They are playing a good season. There is Chelsea and Tottenham, who play great football. Manchester United will be a tough team to beat, but that also goes for Chelsea and Tottenham. All the players are playing the way he [Jose Mourinho] wants it in his second season and they have adapted. It's working well for Mourinho. He is doing a good job. Mourinho has his way of watching the game and his teams are always very competitive. They defend very well and always want to win.

World Cup qualifier... in action against Switzerland

The Manchester clubs are on the different end of the style spectrum...
Yes, all these teams have the quality of defending well and trying not to concede. Then they counter-attack and try to grab control of the game. Manchester United is a very physical team with [Romelu] Lukaku. It's a very competitive team. City has a different style of play. We like to have the ball and control the game, to not let our opponent have the ball and come close to our goal. The two different styles have been successful this season.



Competitive...with Manchester United's Victor Lindelof

Can City win the Champions League?
It's a different competition. You never know what will happen in the knockout phase. All details are important – a penalty, an offside goal, a red card – in the knockout games. You always have to be very focused. You have to be lucky as well to win this kind of competition, with great teams like Barcelona, Madrid, Munich, Juventus, PSG and teams from other countries.

Last season, with Monaco, you eliminated City in the round of 16...
I wasn't at Manchester City the last few years, but it's true that last season, at Monaco, we eliminated Manchester City. They had a good team. This team is better prepared for all the difficulties that you can face in the Champions League. As I said, you have always to be focused and details are very important. Monaco was winning 2-1 at the Etihad [Stadium] last season, then we were winning 3-2, but in the end we lost 5-3, conceding goals from free-kicks, corners and in the last minutes. All the details are important when you play the Champions League.

Does the World Cup speak more to your imagination than the Champions League?
Both competitions are very important, as you can imagine. The Champions League is the most important competition at club level. That is true for the World Cup at international level. It's a very special competition because it happens only once every four years. To win one or another would be great. It's not easy to win these competitions, but when you talk about the World Cup it is special because it comes around only every four years. I hope I don't have an injury and that Portugal can do a good job.

In 2016 you were sidelined from Euro 2016 and Portugal's biggest-ever triumph due to injury. How difficult was that?
It was a bit difficult, not to be able to help the team. It was great for Portugal to win our first international title and to see all my friends winning it for the country. I was a bit sad not to be there, but it was great for Portugal.

Do you think the criticism of Portugal for playing defensive football was justified?
It's true that it was a little bit defensive and counter-attacking, but what matters is that Portugal won the title. It was the first international title for the country and in five years time no one will remember how Portugal won it. What people will remember is that Portugal won the title.

Education...Silva learns from Guardiola (right) every day

A year later, Portugal reached the semi-finals of the Confederations Cup. How was your first major tournament?
It was great to play for my country in an important competition. Unfortunately we couldn't get past Chile in the semi-finals after a penalty shoot-out. It was a good competition and it was good to adapt to the Russian pitches and atmosphere, where we will play this summer.

What's your opinion of VAR?
If it helps the referees to make correct decisions, it's good for football. Everyone today talks about referees and the bad decisions. If VAR can help and let people concentrate on the game – to be passionate about the game and not the referee and his decisions – it will be good.

What is a realistic target for Portugal at the World Cup?
I'd like to think that it's realistic to win the World Cup. When you get to Russia, you can win or not. We will do our best to win it.

What is the meaning behind your tattoo, "E pluribus unum"?
I spent 12 years at Benfica. It was an important stage in my life: all the people, the team-mates, the fans that helped me. I spent most of my life there. I felt I had to make something that would always make me remember about it. It means "Out of many, one". Benfica is the club that I have always supported.

You went to university but didn't graduate. Will you return to university after your football career?
You never know. Today I am not thinking about it. I still have so many years in front of me in football. I am focused on football, but when I am done we will see what happens. Perhaps after my career I can remain in football as a coach or a manager.

It was a Thursday morning in February and the headline was shocking. Splashed across the front of one of Madrid's two sports dailies were huge yellow letters spelling out a stark and simple message in capitals: "ZIDANE WANTS TO SELL ISCO."

All across Spain, it was easy to imagine people picking up their paper and thinking: "You what? Isco? Now?"

One man who might not have been quite so surprised was Francisco Roman Alarcon Suarez himself. "When you get it right, you're God," said Isco two months previously. "But when you fail four or five ▸ passes, they want to get you out."

He always knew that something like this could come and he knew that it had been close before. He knows that things change quickly in football. But, still...

At first glance, the news was hard to believe – and not just because the TV show that broke the story doesn't exactly have the best reputation. The story was quickly rubbished by Real Madrid boss Zinedine Zidane but the programme is very close to club president Florentino Perez and often does his bidding for him.

Isco has always been talented. He's always had that walk, too: legs bent inwards, backside hanging beneath his body. "I've got twisted feet," he has admitted. One of the scouts that first signed him describes him as "culón" – in other words, he has a big arse.

When he was a kid he took a ball everywhere with him and claimed that his football came from the streets – not so different as a professional as it had been when he was little. "What I want is the ball," he says – which was sometimes a problem as his coaches often wanted him to be more serious, more dedicated, more practical. But while that may still be the case at times, there is no doubting that talent.

"He's capable of doing things that very few people can do," says Zidane – and if anyone knows a thing or two about rare talent it is him.

Zidane was once asked if he saw himself in Isco. Maybe he had to say this, but he said "yes". Carlo Ancelotti had said much the same thing, insisting that, one day, Isco could be "very close" to Zidane.

> "Ever since we were kids we used to say to ourselves: 'If he doesn't make it, we'll never know anyone who does'"
> A childhood team-mate

The question was always, when would that day arrive and would he be given the opportunity to prove that he could emulate the Frenchman?

His team-mates have always thought he could and in the Real Madrid dressing room his nickname is "Magia". Let's face it, you've got to be pretty bloody good for that in a dressing room containing Cristiano Ronaldo, Gareth Bale, Karim Benzema, Luca Modric and suchlike.

Real full-back Dani Carvajal describes him as "pure fantasy", and in a time of athleticism there is something more aesthetic about Isco. Slower, sure, but a little bit special.

When he was young he played for Atletico Benamiel on gravel pitches not far from Malaga, where a childhood team-mate insists: "He was always capable of doing magic. It didn't matter if it was on the pitch or walking back home from school, there was always a ball at his feet.

"Ever since we were kids we used to say to ourselves: 'If he doesn't make it, we'll never know anyone who does.'

"You could see he was special. The funny thing was, at the time there were scouts constantly watching him but no one used to call him.

"People used to say because of the bandy legs, or he's too slow."

Not all of them, however, were so swift to dismiss him. Valencia came for Isco and then, at 19, Malaga. Valencia had not always been sure – he didn't fit the aggressive approach they wanted and they feared that the fantasy was offered up in lieu of fitness. Malaga, meanwhile, was an attractive option: not only were they his home-town team, they were also building up – even if there was a nagging doubt that Pellegrini tried to play upon: just how much would he play?

The answer, eventually, was "always". Well, for a while, at least – and certainly when Madrid were at their very best, achieving something that even the most decorated club in world football had not achieved for 59 years in winning La Liga and the Champions Cup.

But it took a very, very long time for that moment to arrive. And then not very long for it to go way again.

On one level, that was natural enough; after all, the competition for places at Madrid is fierce as the squad contains the very best in the world. And when you've got Bale, Benzema and Ronaldo to fit into a side, a enforced preference for 4-3-3 means that Isco's preferred position as a kind of no10 doesn't even exist. Although he played two Champions League Finals, both of them were as a substitute – though it is often forgotten just how impressive he was against Atletico Madrid in 2016.

Then there were the doubts about his own performances. While most would not agree with the former Madrid player Ivan Helguera – who claimed last year that Isco doesn't provide assists, doesn't win the ball and doesn't give as much as he could, complaining that with one trick he has the fans eating out of his hand – a side to challenge Real Madrid and Barcelona. The coach, Manuel Pellegrini, was enamoured of him and later did all he could to take Isco to Manchester City with him.

That Malaga side didn't last for long – the team was soon torn down, the assets stripped and sold off – but they did reach the Champions League semi-finals. Playing with freedom just behind the centre-forward, Isco was superb as Malaga played with possession and patience, accumulating men inside before giving him the ball to feet.

That summer there were options. Isco was a Barcelona fan as a kid and has a labrador called Messi, but when Real Madrid came for him his mind was made they might have conceded that there was something in the question, "what do his moves end up as?" Asked about Isco recently, Xavi replied with a question of his own: "How many tricks and flicks does Messi do?"

Isco admits: "I'm not stupid. If I have not been a starter with Ancelotti, Benitez and Zidane, it's my fault." But it is also about being given the chance to show what he can do and the need for continuity – and that eventually came late last season.

"Bale got injured and there I was ready to take advantage of my opportunity," says Isco.

Going into the Champions League quarter-final second leg with Bayern Munich, 21 players in Real Madrid's squad had played more minutes than him. But after that he played every game all the way through to the Final, and he played regularly in the league, too.

Zidane shifted the shape of the side, playing Isco in a midfield role behind the strikers in which he was outstanding, producing the best football of his career, being effective as well as aesthetic. The team benefitted too, gaining control and creativity, more balance, and a way through sides that sat deep and sought to blunt what had become Madrid's traditional weapon of choice: the counter-attack.

He looked sharp, fit, slimmer and faster than before. Decisive too, with goals and assists came with virtually every match. You could genuinely make a case for him being the best player in La Liga in the second half of the season.

On the way to a league and European Cup double, Isco was thinking over a new contract offer from Madrid. With Barcelona waiting in the wings, he had not intended to sign it, fearful of how much football he was going to get. But the last two months made up his mind and he signed a deal until 2022, with a €700million buyout clause.

"I don't feel like a starter because at Madrid we all are, and the manager can only play 11, but I do feel important," he said. And that was what he needed most of all, what he had been seeking. For the first time he went into a campaign thinking he had found himself.

"I have grown as a footballer," he explained. "I have improved, I score more goals than before because I play nearer the area and 'Zizou' has been very important for that. I'm playing further forward, where I have played my whole life and where I can provide assists.

"Zidane knows me well and knows how to get the best out of me. As for me, I had the patience to wait when I didn't have the opportunities I wanted."

Local hero...playing for Spain against Costa Rica in Malaga

When asked what has changed, Zidane answered: "Just confidence. He knows that he is an important player. He plays as if he was in the street and I like that because he doesn't worry when things don't come off. He is very comfortable on the pitch. I'm pleased that we're seeing a better Isco every day."

At last, it seemed, Isco had made it and his form this term continued to impress, even though Madrid didn't. Away to Girona he was the one bright spot in a poor team performance and that was far from unique. He, almost alone, was blameless as weeks passed.

The national team confirmed that, with coach Julen Lopetegui stating: "His effort is clearer each day. He's no longer that kid that stands watching during games. His body and mind have changed bit by bit." Against Italy, at the Bernabeu, he ran the game and scored twice. Facing Costa Rica in Malaga, his home town, the stadium chanted: "Isco! Isco! Isco!" As one paper put it: "When Isco starts to play, football enters into a dimension where most of us mere mortals start drooling."

Slowly, though, Isco started to slip from prominence. With Madrid struggling to find form, Zidane sought other solutions and Isco sat out the clasico. The return to fitness of Bale means a return to a front three and the disappearance of Isco's role once again.

Isco had always feared that was a possibility but must have felt he deserved a first-team place. And it would be natural, given his impact since last spring, to believe he would be accommodated.

Without that, he might have resisted signing his contract in the summer.

At 25 he was entitled to think that he had reached the very top and that headline probably hurt. The idea that Real Madrid might sell Isco when he at last had become the player they always knew he could be seemed baffling, just when he led them to the most successful season in their history.

However, reaching the top is one thing; staying there quite another, especially at Madrid. Even when you're Magic. WS

MALCOM

Age 20 (26.02.97), winger, Bordeaux & Brazil

In a sentence
Valued in the €50-60million bracket, the game-changing winger could have been at Arsenal or Tottenham Hotspur if the Bordeaux president, Stephane Martin, had not refused to let him go during January's transfer window.

What they say
French TV commentator Yann Riou: "Everything he does is about instinct, talent and even arrogance. He's an individualist. He always plays on the edge."

Former French international midfielder and Paris Saint-Germain coach Luis Fernandez: "He's so influential and gives Bordeaux an extra dimension. He oozes quality, strength and, on the ball, makes it all look too easy."

Brazil coach Tite, who used to be his boss at Corinthians: "He's one of the players we're looking at. He's maturing, his approach play is better and he has improved his finishing. He's young, a boy, but is making great progress."

3 THREE THINGS YOU DIDN'T KNOW ABOUT MALCOM

- He was named after his dad's hero, African-American human rights activist Malcolm X.
- Back in December 2014, Marseille were keen to sign him and even invited him to have a look around the club. Sadly for OM, they opted to pass on the teenager.
- The former Brazil midfielder Ze Roberto played a key role in his move to France, advising Bordeaux coach Willy Sagnol to snap him up.

The story so far
Born in Sao Paulo, Malcom Filipe Silva de Oliveira came through the youth ranks at Corinthians and made his first-team debut in September 2014, scoring his first top-flight goal the same month in a 1-1 draw with Chapecoense. A regular starter by the end of 2015, he helped the club to win the league that year and was rumoured to be on the radar of Roma, Internazionale, Borussia Dortmund, Marseille, Chelsea and Dynamo Kiev. However, he chose to make Bordeaux his European launch pad and signed for them in January 2016. Yet to be capped at full international level, he has extensive experience with the Brazil under-20 side and was a runner-up at the 2015 world finals in New Zealand.

The next step
Despite having three-and-a-half years left on his current contract, the smart money has to be on him moving to England at the end of this season. On and off the pitch, Bordeaux are in a state of flux at the moment and the club's board will be sorely tempted to take the money and run, using the much-needed windfall to buy three or four new players.

> "He's one of the players we're looking at. He's maturing, his approach play is better and he has improved his finishing"
> Brazil coach Tite

Strengths
Able to go past defenders with speed, trickery and a velvety touch, he has a wand of a left foot. Boasts a magnificent range of pass and can control the tempo of a game. Prefers to be used on the right flank but also can deliver as a left-winger or second striker.

Weaknesses
Not the most consistent or defensively disciplined, he can be subject to mood swings. Heading the ball is a task for others.

Abdoulaye TOURE

Age 24 (03.03.94), midfielder, Nantes & France
Under coach Claudio Ranieri, the midfield holder has come on in leaps and bounds. A ferocious ball-winner, he is aerially dominant and much more assured in his distribution than he used to be. He has represented France in several youth categories.

Martin TERRIER

Age 21 (04.03.97), striker, Strasbourg (on loan from Lyon) & France
Skilful and intelligent, he looks the part either as a central striker or a left-winger. Began the season on loan at Strasbourg from Lille, only to sign for Lyon in an €11m deal in January before being loaned back to the Alsace club.

Nordi MUKIELE

Age 20 (01.11.97), defender, Montpellier & France
Quick, strong in the air and comfortable on the ball, the centre-half was signed from second-tier Laval in the January 2017 transfer window and is currently being watched by the likes of Chelsea, Roma and RB Leipzig.

Samuel GRANDSIR

Age 21 (14.08.96), striker, Troyes & France
Right-sided attacker and the latest player to emerge from the Norman town of Evreux, following in the footsteps of keeper Steve Mandanda, full-back Bernard Mendy, one-time midfielder Mathieu Bodmer and wide-man Ousmane Dembele.

Andre-Frank ZAMBO ANGUISSA

Age 22 (16.11.95), midfielder, Marseille & Cameroon
It is incredible to think that just a couple of years ago the defensive midfielder was ridiculed by OM fans for his alleged lack of technical ability. Over the last season-and-a-half he has undergone a complete transformation, constantly earning praise for his use of the ball, bite in the tackle and boundless energy.

KWON Chang-hoon

Age 23 (30.06.94), midfielder, Dijon & South Korea
Technically proficient right-winger who is full of electric intent. Joined Dijon from Suwon Bluewings for €1.2m in January 2017, apparently spurning big-money offers from China and the Gulf to set up home in the Burgundian city.

Tanguy NDOMBELE

Age 21 (28.12.96), midfielder, Lyon (on loan from Amiens) & France
Central midfielder who helped Amiens achieve a first-ever promotion to the top-flight last term before joining Lyon on transfer deadline day in August and carving out a regular first-team spot. Arguably the best box-to-box player in France at the moment, he particularly impressed in both of OL's clashes with Paris Saint-Germain this term.

Jonathan BAMBA

Age 21 (26.03.96), midfielder, Saint-Etienne & France
An explosive threat playing anywhere along the front line, the academy graduate is enjoying a wonderful first season as a first-teamer with Les Verts. Unfortunately, player and club are not on the best of terms after recent contract renewal talks. If no new deal is struck he will be free to leave on a Bosman next summer.

6 of the best January tranfers

Nick Bidwell on the best moves in the winter window

1 Lassana DIARRA

(UNATTACHED TO PARIS SAINT-GERMAIN, FRA)

PSG's decision to recruit the out-of-contract 32-year-old defensive midfielder – who only managed a handful of starts in his last posting at Emirati club Al Jazira – left many pundits scratching their heads in bewilderment. The French club, however, see it as a win-win deal, bringing in an experienced veteran – Chelsea, Arsenal, Real Madrid and Marseille all feature on his CV, along with 34 caps for Les Bleus – for very little outlay to address a problem area. Until recently, the injury-prone Thiago Motta was the only recognised enforcer in the squad, and for such an ambitious club this lack of depth clearly was unsustainable. An expert ball-winner, tactically smart and a gifted dribbler and passer, "Lass" has the potential to be a real tonic for the Parc des Princes troops and a big influence on matchdays.

2 Rasmus NISSEN

(MIDTJYLLAND, DEN, TO AJAX, HOL, €5.3M)

A first-teamer with Midtjylland for almost two years, the 20-year-old right-back is the 27th Dane to have joined the Ajax ranks, following in the footsteps of such names as Soren Lerby, Frank Arnesen, Jesper Olsen, Jan Molby and Christian Eriksen, not to mention current "Ajacied" stars Kasper Dolberg and Lasse Schone. Although the Amsterdam club intend to ease the newcomer in gently, initially using him as an understudy to Joel Veltman, his long-term prospects seem very bright indeed. In an Ajax side which instinctively likes to be on the front foot he should be in his element. A Danish under-21 international, his uncle, Sigurd Kristensen, was a midfielder in the 1990s for Austrian side Sturm Graz, while his cousin Leon Jessen was a defender with Midtjylland and German club Kaiserslautern.

3 Jurgen LOCADIA

(PSV, HOL, TO BRIGHTON & HA, ENG, £14M)

Acquired for a club-record fee, the Dutch winger or centre-forward was on the scoresheet for PSV's under-23 side so often that he was dubbed "The Monday Night Messi". He got a hat-trick on his Eredivisie debut, against VVV in September 2012, and amassed a total of 62 goals in 176 competitive games for PSV over five and-a-half seasons. In recent times, such prolific Eredivisie marksman as Mateja Kezman, Jon-Dahl Tomasson, Afonso Aves, Memphis Depay and Vincent Janssen have all flopped in the English top flight, but the 24-year-old's directness and upper-body strength mean he should not find the Premier League such a culture shock. All will depend on how well he adapts to the high tempo of the play.

4 Yerry MINA

(PALMEIRAS, BRA, TO BARCELONA, SPA, €11.8M)

Named after the Tom & Jerry cartoon – although spelt with a "Y" – he is physically intimidating and excellent in recovery mode. And the 23-year-old's creative side isn't too shabby either, with his dynamic bursts into midfield and laser-guided long balls. At 6ft 5in he is now the tallest player in the Barca squad and as a youngster he aspired to be a goalkeeper – the position his father, Jose-Eulises, used to play for leading Colombian sides Deportivo Cali and Once Caldas. Every time he changes club he performs the unusual ritual of walking bare foot onto the turf at his new home stadium.

5 Fredy MONTERO

(TIANJIN TEDA, CHN, TO SPORTING, POR, UNDISCLOSED FEE)

In with a chance of a first league title in a decade-and-a-half, Sporting are convinced they have fortified their attacking options with the signing of the Colombian, who has returned to the Alvalade stadium after a two-term hiatus: at Tianjin TEDA in China and on loan to MLS side Vancouver Whitecaps. As the pressure builds, the battle-hardened 30-year-old could well turn out to be a trump card. With his poaching prowess, creativity and intelligent movement, he represents a potent all-round threat and should, if all goes according to plan, prove an ideal foil for towering Dutch striker Bas Dost. In his first spell at Sporting, from 2013 to 2016, he was very much a crowd favourite, revered for the part he played in the team's victory over Braga in the 2015 Portuguese Cup Final, as his injury-time equaliser paved the way for penalty shoot-out glory.

6 Sandro WAGNER

(HOFFENHEIM, GER, TO B MUNICH, GER, €12M)

Never one to betray the slightest hint of false modesty, the 30-year-old target man has said: "To my mind, I'm by far the best German striker around. That's been the case for quite some time. I've a way of playing which no one else has." Born and raised in Munich, he spent over a decade playing for Bayern's schoolboys, juniors and reserves, making five first-team appearances in 2007-08. After two seasons as Bayern's leader of the line, Robert Lewandowski could use the occasional rest – and the returning striker will bring an entirely different skill-set: namely aerial power, physical presence and good old-fashioned nuisance value. The all-important question is, how will he cope with the role of stand-in?

Neville rides media storm

Baptism of fire for new England boss

There has never been a more bewildering choice as manager of an England senior team, male or female. But, in one respect, Phil Neville's appointment to the women's side was a success even before he had seen a competitive female match, never mind coached one.

Part of the reasoning behind selecting the 59-times capped ex-England men's international was to raise the sport's profile. And it certainly did that.

When the former Manchester United and Everton player was formally unveiled, the national media turned out in force. He underwent a battery of TV interviews, then faced writers whose usual beat involves grilling men's manager Gareth Southgate. Only then was there an audience with the specialist women's football writers – who previously would have been the only journalists present.

Admittedly the discovery of past misogynist tweets was a factor, but it was nevertheless testament to the enduring star power of United's fabled "Class of '92" (Neville, elder brother Gary, David Beckham, Paul Scholes and Nicky Butt). The Football Association is now hoping "the winning mentality" instilled in that group by Alex Ferguson also lingers.

That appears the main justification for the FA's shock choice. While highly qualified on paper, Neville has managed just a handful of matches, for non-league Salford City, Valencia and England's under-21 men. And although the women's job specification called for "a track record of consistent and successful management", he has shown no previous interest in women's football and had been out of work for 18 months.

Baroness Sue Campbell, the architect behind Team GB's recent haul of Olympic gold medals, oversaw the selection process and revealed that the FA turned to Neville after considering 147 other candidates in 30 countries, four of whom made a shortlist before withdrawing.

"You could say any name in the women's game and I could tell you we spent quality time talking to those people," explains Campbell, who adds media coverage of the departure of Neville's predecessor, Mark Sampson, put many candidates off. Sampson was fired by the FA after it looked again at a consenting adult relationship he had with a player in his charge at Bristol Academy prior to becoming England boss. This seemed convenient given Sampson was embroiled at the time in allegations of racist behaviour towards England player Eniola Aluko.

"Having seen the way Mark's departure was dealt with by the media, many were very nervous of the scrutiny – not just for themselves but for their families," continues Campbell. "I respect that. This is not a job you can force on someone."

Determined...Fara Williams of England in November's World Cup qualifier against Kazakhstan

Two potential coaches, Vera Pauw (now at Houston Dash, and previously coach of Holland, Scotland, Russia and South Africa) and Carolina Morace (former coach of Italy and Canada, and now in charge of Trinidad & Tobago), were quick to dispute this. "I'm sorry, you can't say there aren't women available who are good enough to coach England and that they're all worried about the media scrutiny," argues Morace. "That's not true. The Baroness is wrong."

Others also felt Campbell was being disingenuous. Had the FA dealt with Aluko's complaint properly when it was first made, the position is unlikely to even have been vacant. Instead, it took three enquiries to establish Sampson had made racist comments, but was not a racist, and would, if still employed, have been sent on an education course, not sacked. The affair ended with senior FA officials, including chairman Greg Clarke and CEO Martin Glenn, being dressed down by a parliamentary committee.

In addition, most of the short-listed candidates are understood to have withdrawn not because of fear of scrutiny but because they were offered alternative jobs during the lengthy wait between the first and second interviews.

Laura Harvey took up a new post at NWSL club Utah Royals, John Herdman swapped Canada's women's team for its men's, and Nick Cushing accepted an extended contract at Manchester City. The fourth, caretaker coach Mo Marley, had been a reluctant applicant in the first place, having been asked to apply by the FA. Emma Hayes, perhaps the outstanding candidate, was already committed to remaining at Chelsea.

Meanwhile Neville's name had been suggested, the grapevine has it, at a drinks party. Campbell, whose background is in netball, is acquainted with the family, not least as sister Tracey has done well as England's netball coach.

Neville underwent six hours of interviews and, says Campbell, "spoke very eloquently about his passion to help and mentor and grow women in the game – something that no one else talked to me about with the same thoughtfulness that he had".

Neville, she suggests, "is the right person for the job at this moment", adding: "I was very clear what I wanted in this job. I started to talk to people that I really trust in the game and his name came up repeatedly.

"[He is a] great leader, inspirational, technically and tactically very good, and a really emotionally intelligent guy. The players wanted someone who could lead them from third to first [in the world rankings]. Phil believes he can work with them to win the World Cup, hopefully an Olympic medal, and hopefully a European Championship in 2021."

> "You can't say there aren't women available who are good enough to coach England"
> Carolina Morace, coach of Trinidad & Tobago

The players, it is understood, are looking forward to working with Neville and are unworried by his sexist tweets, most of which appear to have been "banter" with family members. The wider women's game, while deeply unhappy with the process that led to Neville's appointment, and suggestions it would be a useful stepping stone for him, are prepared to back him now he is in place.

Neville faces a tough start in his new job with matches against USA, France and Germany in the SheBelieves Cup in March. That is followed by the key World Cup qualifier at home to Wales in April.

Under Sampson England reached the semi-finals in the 2015 World Cup and 2017 European Championship. Improving on that record will be difficult, but it is what is expected of Neville by fans, players, the FA – and himself. WS

BREAKERS BREAK-UP

Boston Breakers, a founding franchise in the National Women's Soccer League (NWSL), folded two months before the start of the 2018 season, reducing the US competition to nine teams.

Breakers' collapse followed the sale of Western New York Flash to North Carolina Courage in late 2016 and the closure this winter of Kansas City.

The Kansas squad immediately formed the basis of Utah Royals, but there was no re-incarnation for the Breakers, who date back to 2001. Their players were re-allocated, with US international Rose Lavelle going to Washington Spirit.

LLOYD HEADS HOME TO THE USA IN THREE-WAY TRADE

The NWSL draft was overshadowed by a blockbuster three-way trade that involved two-time FIFA world player of the year Carli Lloyd returning to Sky Blue in her native New Jersey.

Canada's Janine Beckie also went from Houston Dash to Sky Blue, Australia's Sam Kerr, who was 2017 NWSL player of the year, left Sky Blue for Chicago Red Stars, and US striker Christian Press completed the circle by swapping Chicago for Houston.

Australia's Steph Catley was also on the move, heading to Seattle Reign from Orlando Pride. Also moving to Pride is Sydney Leroux. She will join her husband, US striker Dom Dwyer, in Orlando. Both had previously been playing in Kansas.

Real Madrid and Barcelona march on in Europe

Real Madrid were featured on the front cover following their remarkable victory over Borussia Dortmund in the UEFA Cup.

The holders made it to the quarter-finals despite losing 5-1 in the first leg of the previous round in Germany. A stunning 4-0 victory in the Bernabeu saw them progress on away goals and they would eventually go on to retain the trophy.

Meanwhile, "the dream of a Barcelona- ➤

Europe's clash of the Titans!

THE dream of a Barcelona-Juventus European Cup Final was shattered when the quarter-final draw for Europe's three major clubs competitions produced this star-studded pairing.

When the world's great millionaire clubs meet this month at Nou Camp's tiered vastness and in Turin, Spanish passion and Italian cunning ensure a fascinating contest.

Chief protagonists will be two exiles — Platini of France and West Germany's Bernd Schuster: rumours of the latter's impending departure for Turin give an already potentially explosive clash, added spice.

Franco-German influence will exert a huge bearing on the eventual outcome: equally decisive will be both sides' defensive ability to cope with such unique talent.

Juventus start favourites. But their burning desire to win the trophy in favourable circumstances is matched by Catalonia's passionate aspiration, to finally witness their beloved Barcelona bring home the coveted Champions' Cup. Now smoothly in their stride after a disastrous start, Archibald's return proved crucial — his goal in the Iberian clash with Porto in the last round squeezed Barcelona through by the away goals rule.

The defence remains suspect and their cavalier attitude will have to be tempered, though 120,000 Catalonians will encourage intimidatory tactics to force Juventus into retaliatory errors. Attacking full-back Julio Alberto will test Juventus on the flanks and defensive vigilance will assume fierce meaning for Victor and Alesanco — though much will depend on their forwards' ability to fluster a fearsome defence.

Juventus, buoyant after their World Club Championship win which spoke volumes for their character, have silenced critics who assumed the close-season departures of Boniek, Rossi and Tardelli would signal deteriorating standards. Replacements Manfredonia, Laudrup and Serena have all contributed handsomely to a brilliant season in which Juventus carved a six-point league lead.

Though fear of the big occasion has apparently been conquered, niggling doubts crept in again following the all-Italian clash with Verona in the last round. Nou Camp will be no place for doubt. But Platini goes from strength-to-strength — anything seems possible, and with last season's defensive line-up intact, continuity has ensured stability.

Terry Venables's biggest challenge to date permits no margin for error; Schuster's performance holds the key to many doors, though I suspect that should Platini utilise fully his unique match-winning talents, even Schuster will not prevent the "old lady" from a semi-final place.

The Bayern Munich-Anderlecht clash is equally intriguing. The Bavarians are chasing Bremen hard in the Bundesliga, but despite sweeping Gornik and FK Austria aside in earlier rounds, the Viennese exposed defensive inadequacies. Bayern's inexperienced youngsters remain inconsistent and with the ageing Hoeness lacking pace, coach Udo Lattek has tried a variety of permutations up front, without success. Augenthaler provides some defensive stability, Lerby the midfield inspiration.

Potentially, Europe's most exciting side, Anderlecht, compound often scintillating performances with the inconsistency which got coach Paul van Himst sacked before Christmas. Entrusted to restore former glories, former Parc Astrid favourite Arie Haan, inherits a side centred round Morten Olsen. In midfield, Vercauteren and Vandereycken's experience complement Scifo's marvellous talent and Vandenbergh provides the forward power.

Haan could have had an easier baptism, but I expect the mauve and whites to qualify — despite indifferent domestic form.

IFK Goteborg will provide Aberdeen with a worthy opponent. Though Orgryte denied IFK another Swedish title, the "angels" — being gradually rebuilt — remain committed to attacking football and dispatched Trakia and Fenerbahce impressively enough. The return of former goalscoring hero Torbjorn Nilsson, has offset the loss of brilliant youngster Mats Gren.

Aberdeen remain inconsistent. The aquisition of Jim Bett has led to no significant im-proverbial and they were fortunate to survive against Servette in the last round. Miller and McCoist remain the mainstay of the side. Goalkeeper Leighton has been in marvellous form and their greater experience should get them through.

On equal terms after the winter shut-down, Steaua should however, end Kiev's fairy-tale run. The Romanian army outfit will repeat the post-time Finnish outfit, who already have beaten Sarajevo and Zenit. But Stoica and Balan's midfield prompting filled to the forward power of Piturca and Lacatus, will I feel venture journeys and for the plucky Finns.

This season's Kiev offers four well-balanced ties. Benfica are so favourites over more to past glories, though John Mortimore's outfit appears better disciplined than in recent years.

A disciplined performance on Gunes appeared then through against Sampdoria in round two — a trait required when the Eagles play Dukla in Prague. The defence consolidated goals, though Portugal's midfield playmaker, Jorge, is hardly a reliable attacker. Carlos Manuel's artistry provides a midfield dynamism well complemented by Diamantino's galloping touch and the side has a well balanced look to it.

Dukla Prague had a dismal season. The defence lacks confidence — particularly away from home and though Pelczarz Vitek score freely, Lisbon's famous "Eagles" should prey on.

Clashes between German sides oldest side of the Berlin will are especially fascinating. Brunden v Uerdingen is no exception. Uerdingen — struggling in the Bundesliga — caused past Barcelona and Galatasaray, but Dresden's hardened European campaigners will be a different proposition.

National team Hans Meldon Hergel is Bayer's best-known player. Operating in a reverse sweeper type role in front of the defence, he relies on Bernd Schuster's creativity and will impressively weighted long balls. His counterpart — the ageing, but highly-influential Hans-Jurgen Dörner, is the lynch behind the attacking plays the Dresden's competently exploit.

Dresden scrambled through against Cercle Brugge on away goals and lost to RSC in Helsinki, though technical proficiency and overall superiority should prevail against their affluent opponents.

Rapid Vienna, last season's finalists, free as intriguing and feeling tie against Dynamo Kiev's improved outfit, for whom Oleg Blokhin — with thoughts of Mexico — is revalised. The Ukrainians recently secured their 11th Soviet title in 28 years and are the Recent on a stepping-stone to greater glory. Blokhin excepted, attacking full-back Demianenko and midfielder Yeremchuk scored vital goals against Craiova and Utrecht, and will cause problems.

And a notable defence — including Balinska and Rensner — will provide sterner opposition for the Rapiders's prolific scoring duo of Krankl and Kranzer, than Tsitsberya and Franz, previously. The Viennese side's strict and efficient man-for-man marking balance a fine nature be which I take Kiev to win.

Atletico Madrid appear to have the edge on a Red Star Belgrade outfit, fortunate to survive their second round encounter with Lyngby, following unsuccessful supersonic cast on Marsiers. Rajic's eligibility

Red Star's outstanding form displays have been matched on foreign soil, scoring twice against Arges and Lyngby. Fisher outshields an attacking 1-3-5-2 formation in which Mijatovic and Dervovic provide the firepower. Much will depend on their performances at Vicente Calderon.

The Belgrade team form has also been away from home — as Celtic discovered to their cost. Correctly third on the domestic front, Madrid rely heavily on Butano and Quique, though I feel they have not replaced adequately Maximo striker Hugo Sanchez, who crossed over to Bernabeu last summer. They would appear to be favourites, though if they have to chase the game at home, their suspect defence could fall prey to Red Star's swiftly executed counter-attacking forays.

The UEFA Cup draw paired holders Real Madrid, with Swiss Angus Inselbuna Neuchatel Xamax — another fascinating prospect. Swiss defeats were cancelled out by a glorious home victory over the first leg. Real, perpetually haunted by old glorious have recently added their own chapter to the club's European legend against Anderlecht last season and Monchengladbach. In the last round three and four goal deficits were cancelled out in glorious fashion.

Step-up coach Luis Molowny's creditable restoration of Madrid's shattered fortunes gave as much to defending certain, spin as Bernabeu, as to summer signings Maceda, Gordillo and Sanchez. Increased competition for places — as Sanchez for places — as Sanchez and Gordillo discovered — has been the key with the Spanish side — at least — most likely renewed.

The Swiss Salvadoran outfit is becoming a fast retreat for Europe's spring elite. Enticing Carlos Hermanos from Grasshoppers was a major coup, and the mountain air has given Uli Stielike and sweeper Don Gentes a new lease of life. Signed from Madrid last summer, Stielike knows all about life outside and though I expect the margin to be slim, the Madridistas should win.

After impressive victories over Metz, Torino and Dnepr, Hajduk Split appear a good outside bet for the trophy. They should beat Waregem — though the Belgians did create a major upset when they beat Milan at San Siro in the last round.

Waregem rely greatly on the front pair of Vert and Desmet, but Split have a tightly knit defence ably marshalled by the experienced Gudelj. Stokovic some class in midfield and the Internationale's clash with Namur provides the Milanese with a final springboard from which to salvage the remnants of a only disastrous season.

Juventus European Cup Final was shattered" when the pair were paired in the last eight. Nevertheless, "Spanish passion and Italian cunning ensure a fascinating contest," wrote Iain Macleod.

He continued: "Juventus start favourites. But their burning desire to win the trophy in favourable circumstances is matched by Catalonia's passionate aspirations to finally witness their beloved Barcelona bring home the coveted Champions Cup."

Macleod pointed out that the "chief protagonists will be two exiles: [Michel] Platini of France and West Germany's Bernd Schuster". He noted that "Franco-German influence will exert a huge bearing on the eventual outcome; equally decisive will be both sides' defensive ability to cope with such unique talent".

Of Juventus, Macleod wrote: "Though fear of the big occasion has apparently been conquered, niggling doubts crept in again following the all-Italian clash with Verona in the last round. Nou Camp will be no place for doubt.

> "Spanish passion and Italian cunning ensure a fascinating contest"

"But Platini goes from strength to strength. Anything seems possible – and with last season's defensive line-up intact, continuity has ensured stability."

As for Barca and their coach, Macleod commented: "Terry Venables' biggest challenge to date permits no margin for error. Schuster's performance holds the key...though I suspect that should Platini utilise fully his unique match-winning talent, even Schuster will not prevent the 'old lady' from a semi-final place."

Macleod did, however, offer the Spanish side a glimmer of hope, suggesting "attacking full-back Julio Alberto will test Juventus on the flanks" while "120,000 Catalans will encourage intimidatory tactics to force Juventus into retaliatory errors".

And his observations were to prove uncannily accurate.

In front of a full Camp Nou, Julio Alberto scored the only goal of the opening leg. Two weeks later in the return, Platini did indeed make his mark with a goal just before half-time, but an earlier strike from Scottish striker Steve Archibald saw Barca win 2-1 on aggregate.

After scraping past Gothenburg in the semi-finals, an expected first-ever European Cup was denied to Barcelona by Steaua Bucharest and they would have to wait another six years to claim European football's ultimate prize. WS

MLS discovers entertainment

Atlanta show the way forward with an influx of young South America talent

MLS enters its 23rd season with all the positives that seem to come every year: more teams, new stadiums, growing fan support, increased television and so on.

Missing from that list, however, is the calibre of the game as played on the pitch. Is it getting better?

The answer is, tentatively, yes – but only within a self-imposed straightjacket.

Almost from the beginning, MLS has lived with the idea of being a physical league. But the attractions of a such an approach are beginning to wear thin, with too many stodgy games and not enough goalscoring.

If the 2016 and 2017 MLS Cup Finals – both of them, as it happens, featuring Toronto and Seattle Sounders – can be said to display MLS football at its best, then there is simply not enough to get excited about.

It is arguable that in the USA, where the game's promoters are trying to popularise not just new teams but a comparatively new sport, entertaining matches are more important than anywhere else. Yet little attention has been paid, either by the league itself or by the clubs, to the idea of entertainment. Physical football, with its largely destructive approach, is not likely to allow the sport's intricate skills to flourish or to encourage goalscoring.

The clubs have been coached, almost exclusively, by Europeans or Euro-influenced Americans. European styles, European tactics and, of course, European players have been the norm.

Latinos, whether players or coaches, have not featured prominently. There has been a slow willingness to recruit South Americans, but those that have arrived – usually mid-career players from Argentina and invariably typical number 10 creative midfielders – have been highly successful.

Javier Morales led Real Salt Lake to the MLS championship in 2009, while Diego Valeri did the same for Portland Timbers in 2015. Other influential Argentinians have included Federico Higuain and Guillermo Barros Schelotto, both with Columbus Crew.

But while there has been no drastic shift as yet, 2018 may well go down as the year MLS opted for entertainment. More South Americans are coming, and they are younger. Much younger.

By mid-February, MLS clubs had signed 20 new South Americans, with their average age being 20 years and five months. And that change can be traced directly to one man: Argentinian coach Gerardo Martino, who was hired by the newly created Atlanta United last year.

Martino brought with him extensive knowledge of the South American scene and a network of contacts – something that has never been a strong point among the MLS Euro-oriented coaches.

Into Atlanta came players from Argentina, Venezuela and, particularly, Paraguay. From day one of last season, Atlanta lit up the league with their fast, intricate play and their goalscoring.

> "The path from Latin America to Europe increasingly passes through the US"
> NYCFC's 20-year-old Paraguayan Jesus Medina

They drew enormous crowds, averaging 48,200 for their 17 home games, winning 11 of them and drawing three, with their highly skilful play a crowd-pleasing change from the now over-familiar physical play.

Atlanta were the team to watch and their star attraction, the dynamic 23-year-old Paraguayan midfielder Miguel Almiron soon became the league's most popular player.

So far, 15 of the 23 MLS clubs have signed young Latinos. Thirteen of the players are outright transfers, while seven are loan deals. Argentina and Venezuela supply six apiece, followed by Paraguay (three), Uruguay (two), with one each from Peru, Ecuador and Chile. Somewhat oddly, there are no Brazilians, and while no Colombians appear on the list so far, that may change if Minnesota United are successful in their quest for Nicolas Benedetti.

Replacement... Jesus Medina

The six Venezuelans include the youngest signing, 18-year-old Cristian Casseres, who joined New York Red Bulls. Across town, New York City FC have signed 20-year-old Paraguayan Jesus Medina as a likely replacement for the young English forward Jack Harrison, who has been whisked away by NYC's parent club, Manchester City.

The prize catch has gone to Atlanta, who paid an MLS record of $15million for 18-year old Argentinian midfielder Ezequiel Barco of Independiente, who was a regular starter last season and a member of their Sudamericana Cup-winning side. European clubs were already circling, but Martino was able to impress the teenager with the opportunities offered by Atlanta.

The new young Latinos will be joining three Mexican veterans: the Dos Santos brothers, Giovani and Jonathan, at LA Galaxy, and Carlos Vela, who was one of the first signings for the expansion Los Angeles FC.

Of course, signing talented youngsters is not without its down side. Can MLS clubs hang on to these players when rich European clubs show interest? New York City know about this with Harrison, and as his replacement Medina has said: "The path from Latin America to Europe increasingly passes through the US."

The problem for MLS is to convince young players that there is a future – and good money – in the league, and that it should not be seen as merely a stepping stone to Europe.

It is to be hoped that the arrival of young Latinos from South America will help the development of young USA-born Latino players. The difficulties faced by such players has been highlighted by the case of Jonathan Gonzalez, a California-born midfielder who had to go to Mexico to be appreciated. At 18 he is holding down a starting position for Monterrey and his decision to play for Mexico and not the US – he holds dual citizenship – exposes severe gaps in the scouting systems of both the US Federation and MLS.

The next chance for MLS to show its preference for a more entertaining Latin-style game will be a challenge to, of all people, David Beckham. His franchise has now been accepted by MLS to form a team that will play, from 2020, in Miami, which has been dubbed "The Capital of Latin America". WS

Big guns compete for more cash

Brazilian clubs are the ones to beat in continental showpiece

Despite Mexican clubs again being absent due to an inability to reconcile their domestic league with the new year-long structure, the prize money for this year's Libertadores Cup has been doubled.

And given the financial advantages its clubs enjoy over their continental rivals, Brazil is the logical place to start when looking for sides capable of claiming those added riches.

No one has managed to retain the Libertadores title since Boca at the start of the century, but this year Gremio will certainly fancy their chances. Last year's winning coach Renato Portaluppi is still at the club – as is Luan, the support striker named as South America's outstanding player of 2017, and little midfielder Arthur, who is firmly on the radar of Barcelona. But while the European summer window is a threat, their biggest challenge may come from some of Gremio's compatriots.

With wealthy sponsors and revenue pouring in from their impressive new stadium, Palmeiras would appear to be in pole position. They have assembled a squad which has considerable depth and plenty of quality, especially since the acquisition of international playmaker Lucas Lima from Santos.

Their big problem last term was piecing together a coherent team from so many signings, but new coach Roger Machado – who had much to do with the start of the rise of the current Gremio team – has been brought in to find a solution.

Palmeiras' historic Sao Paulo rivals Corinthians are a mirror image. Their new stadium is proving something of a burden and the club's finances are not healthy, but they do have a well consolidated idea of play, put into practice effectively in last year's domestic league win by coach Fabio Carille. Much will depend on how he copes without centre-forward Jo, who was Brazil's player of the year in that title-winning campaign before leaving for Nagoya Grampus in Japan.

Santos will surely suffer from the loss of Lucas Lima and ex-international centre-forward Ricardo Oliveira, who has joined Atletico Mineiro, although Gabriel "Gabigol" Barbosa has returned on loan from a very disappointing time in Europe with Internazionale. Coach Jair Ventura, who was so impressive at Botafogo, faces his biggest test yet.

There have been numerous recent Libertadores disappointments for Rio's Flamengo and they look some way behind their Sao Paulo rivals after a destabilising start to the year, with coach Reinaldo Rueda resigning to take charge of Chile. Paulo Cesar Carpeggiani was hurriedly brought in as a replacement but if they can get out of the group phase, their mass support will make them tough opponents.

Dark horses...Bolivian rivals Oriente Petrolero (in green) and Jorge Wilstermann met in the qualifying rounds

Menezes tends not to favour a target man up front, so it will be fascinating to see how he incorporates new signing Fred, the 2014 World Cup centre-forward, in the side.

Last year Cruzeiro let go of their Argentinian striker Ramon Abila and he now lines up at Boca Juniors, who have brought back Carlos Tevez from Chinese club Shanghai Shenhua. Much of this move was bankrolled by a new TV deal that should aid a strong showing from the Argentinian clubs this term.

Boca return after a year's absence and coach Guillermo Barros Schelotto has an impressive squad, with the depth to shrug off some recent injury problems. Knitting an ageing Tevez back into the team may not be an easy task, but there is pace around him with Cristian Pavon and plenty of midfield options.

Semi-finalists last year, River Plate are more of a work-in-progress and have some big-name new signings to assimilate in international centre-forward Lucas Pratto, goalkeeper Franco Armani and, intriguingly, Colombian playmaker Juan Fernando Quintero, a player of immense talent whose career has taken him down a blind alley. If coach Marcelo Gallardo can help him rediscover his hunger and his touch, River will be very easy on the eye.

Sudamericana Cup winners last December, Independiente have a fascinating coach in Ariel Holan, with his background in field hockey and an open-minded approach. Their neighbours Racing are now coached by Eduardo Coudet, who did such impressive work at Rosario Central. Both Holan and Coudet's squads lack the quality and depth of Boca and River, but it will be interesting to see if they can gain momentum during the campaign, with much the same applying to Lucas Bernardi's Estudiantes.

Early exit...debutants Macara of Ecuador went out in the qualifying rounds

Only twice in the last 17 years has the title eluded the Brazil-Argentina axis, with the last time being in 2016, when the champions were Atletico Nacional of Colombia. Their new Argentinian coach Jorge Almiron, who took Lanus to last year's Final, comes highly rated and does not represent a radical departure from his predecessors. But while another title looks a long shot, Nacional will be well worth keeping an eye on during this campaign – especially because of their group opponents.

One of those is Bolivar. Clubs from Bolivia have enjoyed surprising success recently, with Bolivar reaching the semi-finals in 2014 and doing just as well away from home as they did at altitude. They showed good domestic form in 2017 and it will be intriguing to see what new Brazilian coach Vinicius Eutropio does with the side.

Also in the group are Colo-Colo. Chilean clubs have an appalling recent record in the Libertadores and in the last three years – and four of the last five – not a single Chilean has made it out of the group phase. Maybe Pablo Guede's team are capable of doing better. With Jorge Valdivia and Jaime Valdes they have plenty of midfield quality and experience, and Esteban Paredes is a proven goalscorer, but can the youngsters compete at this level?

Last year the team that ran the Brazilians and Argentinians closest was Barcelona of Ecuador, but they have not qualified this year – a consequence of taking their eye off domestic form and making the Libertadores their priority. However, their Guayaquil rivals Emelec are back. Last year they made the knockout stage before going out on penalties and Uruguayan coach Alfredo Arias has stayed on, winning the domestic title with a side that break forward with pace and power.

However, being drawn in a tough group that includes River Plate and Flamengo leaves little margin for error. WS

Champions League gets underway

Saudis and UAE back down ahead of kick-off

With Saudi Arabia and the UAE severing diplomatic, financial and travel ties with Qatar in June, the 2018 Asian Champions League was making headlines before it had even begun.

With Qatari teams in each of the four West Asian groups – the 32 teams are split into two geographic regions until the Final – fixtures against Saudi and Emirati opposition was assured, and a request for neutral venues for such fixtures – which would have been contrary to competition rules and the spirit of the game – was rejected by the AFC in late January.

With the politics out of the way, attention can at last turn to the football – and in particular the Chinese challenge.

Strong...Shanghai SIPG (in red) beat Thailand's Chiangrai United in the qualifiers

Quarter-finals August 27-29 & September 17-19
Semi-finals October 1-3 & 22-24
Final November 3 & 10

Three of the four Chinese Super League teams involved have real ambitions of lifting the trophy in November.

The only one to do so, in 2013 and 2015, is Guangzhou Evergrande, and despite saying goodbye to coach Luiz Felipe Scolari at the end of last season – after a seventh successive league title – they have the experience and talent to go all the way. Fabio Cannavaro is the new man in charge, returning to the club that sacked him three years ago after just six months in the job. Winning a third Asian title would be a perfect way to stamp his authority on a team that includes Ricardo Goulart and plenty of Chinese internationals.

Cannavaro left Tianjin Quanjian to take the post and was replaced in the port city by Paulo Sousa, who has stars such as Axel Witsel, Alex Pato and Anthony Modeste at his disposal, and the firepower to do well in a first continental campaign. The same can also be said of last year's semi-finalists Shanghai SIPG, who still have Hulk in their ranks, but Chinese Cup winners Shanghai Shenhua will surely struggle without Carlos Tevez.

South Korea remains the most successful nation in terms of club titles but its sides performed poorly last time out. Jeonbuk Motors, who weren't allowed to defend their 2016 title after a club scout was found guilty of bribing referees during the 2013 K-League campaign, are the country's best bet to lift a 12th continental championship.

The trophy currently resides with Urawa Reds, but they haven't qualified, so Japanese hopes rest with Kawasaki Frontale, who won their first J.League title in 2017, and Kashima Antlers, who are still seeking a first continental trophy.

Australian sides tend to struggle as their champions are crowned in May and they then have to wait almost a year to compete in Asia. However, Sydney have dominated domestically again this term and Asia will be a good test for Graham Arnold, who has been tipped to be the next coach of the national team after the recently appointed Bert Van Marwijk.

Only one West Asian team has broken eastern dominance since 2005: Al Sadd of Qatar. With Xavi in their ranks they have a chance again, as do fellow Doha club Al Gharafa with Wesley Sneijder.

Saudi Arabia's Al Hilal have lost two of the last four Finals and have been busy in the transfer market. Runners-up in 2016, Al Ain of the United Arab Emirates are also keen to add to their 2003 win, although star playmaker Omar Abdulrahman has been in uncertain form of late.

Iranian clubs have yet to win the Champions League, but with Uzbekistan lifting the AFC Under-23 title in January this could be a good year for Central Asian football. WS

Grampus make the headlines

Brazilian striker Jo is the big pre-season signing

Back in the top flight a year after they were relegated, Nagoya Grampus stole the pre-season headlines with their €11million signing of former Manchester City striker Jo from Brazilian champions Corinthians, where he was Serie A's joint-top scorer and player of the year last term.

The arrival of the 31-year-old, who has been capped 20 times by his country, is intended to announce a sea change for a club whose fortunes have dipped sharply in recent years.

His signing harks back to the early days of the J.League when Grampus led the way in importing big-name players and managers such as Gary Lineker, Dragan Stojkovic and Arsene Wenger to kick-start interest in the nascent competition.

> "I will work hard to win the title for everyone who is cheering us on"
> Nagoya Grampus' new striker Jo

Stojkovic would later return as coach and lead the club to the championship in 2010, but since then Grampus have flattered to deceive, and the question now is whether a side that struggled to gain promotion from the J2 League will fare any better this time out. Jo, however, is talking about winning the league, stating: "I will work hard to win the title for everyone who is cheering us on."

Having led Grampus back to the top flight in his first season, Yahiro Kazama will hope to give the team's long-suffering supporters some instant reward after their year in the wilderness. And precedents for newly promoted teams doing well in their first season back have piled up in recent years, with Cerezo Osaka's impressive third-place finish last term and Kashiwa Reysol's back-to-back J2 and J1 titles in 2010 and 2011. Grampus' prospects of a successful campaign should also be reinforced by the arrival Australia goalkeeper Mitch Langerak from La Liga side Levante.

Defending champions Kawasaki Frontale were the league's top scorers last season, with 71 goals, but that hasn't stopped them from making serious reinforcements in attack. The most striking new arrival is Yokohama F.Marinos captain Manabu Saito, a winger with an outside chance of making Japan's World Cup squad this summer. Sidelined with a ligament injury since September, he probably won't be ready for the start of the J1 League but will be eager to make his mark in time for Russia.

Statement...Jo won the Brazilian title last year with Corinthians

World Cup veteran Yoshito Okubo, the J.League's top scorer with Kawasaki for three years in a row from 2013-15, also returns after a year away at FC Tokyo. It was partly Okubo's absence that allowed Yu Kobayashi, the league's top scorer and player of the year in 2017, to shine so brightly in Kawasaki's championship season, and Okubo may have to settle for being his sidekick.

Heading into the final stages of last season's championship, Kashima Antlers looked to have their title defence sewn up before an uncharacteristic slip. Nevertheless, the quality of the squad remains unquestioned and Go Oiwa, who took over as coach midway through last year, will be expected to mount a challenge after his appointment was extended.

Antlers welcome back defender Atsuto Uchida from Union Berlin after seven-and-a-half years in Germany, although his recent injury problems continue. Meanwhile, young hopefuls Gen Shoji, Naomichi Ueda, Kento Misao and Shoma Doi are all firmly in the spotlight for World Cup selection, while not-so-young wing-back Shuto Yamamoto is also knocking heavily on the national-team door.

Cerezo Osaka made a spectacular return to the top flight last season after two years in the second tier, winning a League Cup and Emperor's Cup double, and finishing third in the league to qualify for the AFC Champions League. Striker Kenyu Sugimoto established his place in the Japan squad alongside team captain Hotaru Yamaguchi, but it remains to be seen if Yoon Jong-hwan's squad is strong enough to cope with this year's added demands.

Kashiwa Reysol, who are also in the Champions League, have made quiet progress under Takahiro Shimotaira and their strong youth element was reflected in the J.League's Best Young Player award to central defender Yuta Nakayama.

Urawa Reds, winners of the 2017 AFC Champions League, can't defend their title after finishing only seventh in the league but that could be a blessing in disguise if it eases their fixture list and now allows them to concentrate on the league. They have a good squad and will be more fired up than ever after last year's roller-coaster ride.

Rafael Silva, the scorer of the Reds' decisive goals in both the semi-final and Final of the Champions League, has left for Chinese club Wuhan Zall but Curacaoan winger Quenten Martinus is a quality signing from Yokohama F.Marinos and may do more than plug that gap.

Reds former boss Mihailo Petrovic, who left midway through last season, has now taken over at Hokkaido Consadole Sapporo, while Kenta Hasegawa is the new man in charge at FC Tokyo after a disappointing campaign last time. Hasegawa's big new signing is Brazilian striker Diego Oliveira, who is on loan from Kashiwa Reysol, but the player to watch could be 16-year old Takefusa Kubo, who made four first-team appearances last year.

Another player of interest will be 32-year-old former Germany striker Lucas Podolski, who had a disappointing start at Vissel Kobe but is still at the club and will hopefully settle in more effectively this term.

While Brazilians continue to dominate the foreign-players slots with 30 confirmed by the start of February, there are five Thais registered so far, including Teerasil Dangda, who has scored 42 goals in 91 games for his country and joins Sanfrecce Hiroshima on loan from Muangthong United. WS

Cork plot title defence

Caulfield targets more success

Cork City boss John Caulfield spent the close season trying to find a replacement for Sean Maguire, who scored 20 times last term before joining Preston North End in July. Cork made a 22-game unbeaten start to the season and went 15 points clear of Dundalk at the top of the table, but without their top scorer Caulfield's side struggled before eventually stumbling over the finishing line to claim a first league title for 12 years.

Caulfield, however, doesn't agree with the term "stumbled" and says: "We also lost Kevin O'Connor to Preston North End at the same time as Maguire, and our captain John Dunleavy was injured. Losing three of your first-team squad is a serious blow.

"We did have a blip and the chasing clubs improved, but we still won the league by seven points with two series of games to be played, and then beat Dundalk to retain the FAI Cup.

"It's always difficult to find goalscorers, but we have brought Graham Cummins back to the club from St Johnstone. He is a local lad who scored the goal that secured promotion to the Premier Division back in 2011. He scored 44 goals in 66 games for the club, but we were in the First Division then. Naturally it will be tougher in the Premier.

"We also got Josh O'Hanlon from St Patrick's Athletic, Irish under-21 international Danny Kane from Huddersfield, Barry McNamee and Aaron Barry from Derry City, and Tobi Adebayo-Rowling from Sligo Rovers.

"It's no secret that there has been a high turnover of League of Ireland clubs in Cork down through the years.

"Cork Hibernians and Cork Celtic won league titles and the FAI Cup Final, but they 'folded' due to poor administration. Now we want to ensure that Cork City is put on a sound financial standing. When I took over as manager at the end of 2013 we had only six players. Now we have built up the club on and off the pitch. We have played in three FAI Cup Finals in a row, winning two, played in Europe and won our first championship in 12 years last season.

"All of our players are on 52-week contracts. During the economic recession in Ireland many clubs were forced into 40-week contracts. But I think it's only right players are on 52-week contracts if they are trying to secure a loan or a mortgage. And City recently appointed Paul Wycherley as general manager. He had previously worked with QPR and Millwall.

"For the past four seasons it has been a two-horse race between Dundalk and ourselves. This season I expect to see a challenge from Shamrock Rovers, Derry City and possibly Sligo Rovers.

"Shamrock has retained nearly all their squad from last season and manager Stephen Bradley has added former Irish international Joey O'Brien, who was released by West Ham. Derry are back home at a revamped Brandywell after a season playing across the border in Buncrana."

> "When I took over as manager at the end of 2013 we only had six players"
> Cork boss John Caulfield

Dundalk have been bought by an American investment company, Peak6, who already have a 25 per cent share in Bournemouth. But while the club lost striker David McMillan to St Johnstone and Patrick McEleney to Oldham Athletic, manager Stephen Kenny has brought Patrick Hoban back to the club and also signed former Hungarian under-21 international Krisztian Adorjan on loan from Italian club Livorno.

Adorjan was once on the books of Liverpool, as was Adam Morgan, who is one of the many newcomers at Sligo Rovers. Sligo have also signed the much travelled Brazilian-born Eduardo Pincelli from Cypriot club Ethnikos Achna.

Caulfield is more than happy to see new players coming into the league and says: "It can only help to raise the standard. The league also provides an opportunity for young Irish players to re-establish themselves.

"You look at players such as Keith Fahey and Seanie Maguire, who joined English clubs when they were very young, didn't manage to settle, came home to play in the League of Ireland, and then moved back to England when they were more mature." WS

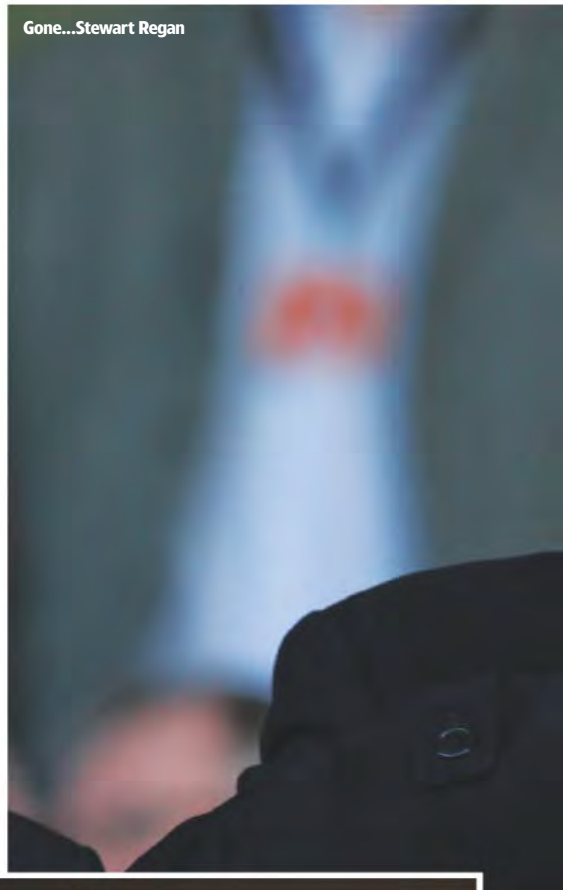
Regan has to pay the price

O'Neill debacle costs SFA chief executive his job



Gone...Stewart Regan

If England's cricketers thought they had a wretched winter in Australia, one of their compatriots was suffering just as badly in Scotland. Glasgow is not the obvious place to feel the heat in January, but Stewart Regan did as he wilted under fierce public and media scrutiny for his failure to find a new Scotland manager, and lost his own job as Scottish FA chief executive.

Regan came to the SFA from Yorkshire Cricket in 2010, but if England lost the Ashes before Christmas, Regan fumbled just as badly when it came to the perfect catch of securing Michael O'Neill as Gordon Strachan's successor.

Strachan's contract was not renewed in October after he failed to qualify for the World Cup finals. The former Celtic manager was harshly ousted by Regan after five years, and the only plan from the SFA was to lure O'Neill once Northern Ireland also failed to qualify for Russia 2018.

Target...Scotland missed out on Michael O'Neill

O'Neill has lived in Edinburgh for years. He played for Hibernian and Dundee United, and began his managerial career at Brechin City. His acceptance of the Scotland job was painted in the media as a done deal.

However, after talks with Regan, O'Neill turned down the SFA and was given a new four-year-deal by the Irish FA – and his new salary was even bigger with his current employers than what the SFA offered.

That was the final nail in Regan's tenure. O'Neill has since hinted of Regan's error in making him the only candidate to succeed Strachan. "The discussions were very amicable and gave me a lot to think about," said O'Neill. "But they went for a manager who was contracted to another association and it's very difficult to leave your own country."

> "In my time in the game, this is as bad as it has been"
> Celtic chief executive Peter Lawwell on the SFA

Regan's failure to have any alternatives meant that other potential recruits, such as Paul Lambert and David Moyes, were ignored and have now taken jobs at Stoke City and West Ham United respectively.

The SFA's performance director, Malky Mackay, is in temporary charge for the friendlies with Costa Rica and Hungary in March, just as he was in November for the game against Holland.

Scotland under-21 coach Scot Gemmill has a lot of admirers for a promotion from within, while Steve Clarke gets the public vote after his good work with Kilmarnock. Former Scotland boss Walter Smith was backed by a press campaign, but he is now 70 and announced his retirement from management in 2011.

The managerial vacuum could last until the summer, when Scotland play friendlies in Peru and Mexico: a tour organised by Regan that will only raise £250,000 but upset Celtic – who provide most of Scotland's players – who were not consulted about a trip just two weeks before the Champions League qualifiers.

There is no timescale for a new chief executive but it will probably be done before the new Scotland manager is appointed.

However, Celtic chief executive Peter Lawwell says the SFA's next chief exec needs to build bridges with clubs. "We need someone who will bring Scottish football together," argues Lawwell. "In my time in the game, this is as bad as it has been. It has to be a priority to build those bridges again."

Lawwell is the most important voice in Scottish football, having overseen Celtic's record £90million turnover last season, with the club announcing a six-month turnover of £72m up to December, which means the 2017-18 sum will eclipse £100m.

But not all of Celtic's ideas for growth are met with enthusiasm, with the champions and Rangers wanting their reserve teams to play in the fourth tier of the SPFL.

Celtic's head of youth Chris McCart and his Ibrox counterpart, Craig Mulholland, visited fourth-tier clubs to make presentations. The Glasgow rivals believe that the concept of B teams in lower leagues helps the development of young players, as in Spain and Holland.

The idea is nothing new. As far back as 1967, Jock Stein wanted to do the same after Celtic won the European Cup, with a reserve team that had teenage talent like Kenny Dalglish.

Celtic and Rangers have tried to sweeten the pot, by offering to play all their games away from home and putting in £15,000 to each of the 10 fourth-tier clubs. But the idea was rebuked by one man from that league, who has a foot in both camps.

Peterhead manager Jim McInally began his career with Celtic and played for Dundee United in the 1987 UEFA Cup Final, and he says: "There is no benefit to lower-league clubs. I don't see why we should try and do Celtic and Rangers' work for them. I'm a Celtic supporter but we have our own players to develop. It demeans the league."

Start... Andrew Robertson with Queens Park (in hoops)

McInally's point is backed up by the rise of Andrew Robertson. The Scotland defender began at modest Queen's Park before Dundee United, Hull City and his £8m transfer to Liverpool.

And with Michael O'Neill starting the coaching ladder at Brechin, the Scottish lower leagues have a good case. WS

Empty...Zamalek (in white) and Al Ahly line up before January's game

AL AHLY v ZAMALEK

The Cairo derby is one of the most violent in the world

In January, a mere 500 invited spectators witnessed Al Ahly beat Zamalek 3-0 in a fixture that regularly saw crowds of 120,000 cram into Cairo's International Stadium as the Egyptian capital came to a standstill. However, past violent clashes and the country's political upheaval of late have resulted in the fixture being moved away from the city, played behind closed doors and even cancelled altogether.

Football arrived in Egypt during British rule in the 1900s and the derby has always been a focal point for political dissent.

Founded in 1909, Al Ahly represented the country's desire for independence, while Zamalek, who were formed two years later, were the club of the city's wealthy elite, bringing Egyptians and Europeans together – as one of their early names, Al Mukhatalat ("Mixed"), suggests.

By the time the Egyptian Premier League began in 1948, Mukhatalat had changed their name to King Farouk club, after the country's monarch. But when he was deposed in 1952, the country's new ruler, General Nasser, was appointed president of Al Ahly. The league was suspended and their rivals were forced to change their name, choosing Zamalek.

These days non-Egyptians have to officiate the game.

After taking charge of the Cairo derby, Scottish referee Hugh Dallas, who is a veteran of Rangers-Celtic clashes in Glasgow, said: "You just don't realise quite how big it is until you see it for yourself.

"I've done 14 or 15 Old Firm matches and even they don't come close. I genuinely believe that this is as big as it gets." WS
